Ruppin, NEU (Noy Roop-peen), a town of Prussia, on a lake communicating with the Elbe, 48 miles by rail NW. of Berlin. Pop. 20,000.

Rurki (Roor-kee), a town in the United Prov. of India, 22 miles E. of Saharanpur. Pop. 15,953.

Rush, a seaport of Ireland, 16 miles by rail NE. of Dublin. Pop. 860.

Rushden, a town in Northamptonshire, 15 miles NE. of Northampton. Pop. 13,400.

Rusholme, a southern suburb of Manchester.

Russe. See RUSTCHUK.

Russell, a New Zealand port, on the Bay of Islands, 147 miles NNW. of Auckland.

Russia, an empire extending over eastern Europe, the whole of northern Asia, and a part of central Asia. Its limits are 38° 30′ and 78° N. lat. and 17° 19′ and 190° E. long. This area, which is more than twice as large as Europe, and embraces one-sixth of the land-surface of the globe, has a pop. estimated at near 164,000,000. (at the census of 1859 the total was only 74,000,000). The Russian empire consists of European Russia, less than one-fourth of the whole, but including nearly three-fourths of its population; Finland; Poland; Caucasia; Siberia; Turkestan; and the Transcaspian region. Khiva and Bokhara are vassal states. The Russian dominions in America (Alaska) were sold to the United States in 1867. The table shows the areas and populations of the various sections of the empire in 1910 (estimated).

	Area in sq. m.	Pop.
The 50 governments of European Russia	1,902,092	118,690,600
The 10 Polish governments	49,157	12,129,200
Finland	144,255	3,030,400
European Russia	2,095,504	133,850,200
Caucasus	182,457	11,735,100
Central Asia	1,638,825	9,973,400
Siberia	4,833,496	8,220,100
Asiatic Russia	6,564,778	24,889,000
Russian Empire	8,660,282	163,778,800

The density of the population, 63·7 per sq. m. in the 50 governments on the average, varies from 250 in Moscow to 1·4 in Archangelsk. In the Polish governments it averages 247·4; in Finland, 24; in Caucasus, 64·9; in Central Asia, 7·5; in Siberia, only 1·6. The average for the empire is 19 per sq. m. The Baltic Sea, with the Gulfs of Bothnia, Finland, and Riga, is the chief sea of Russia; but it nowhere touches purely Russian territory, its coasts being peopled by Finns, Letts, Esthonians, and Germans. Nevertheless, four out of the five chief ports of Russia—St Petersburg, Reval, Libau, and Riga—are situated on the Baltic Sea, and except Libau, are frozen for from four to five months in the year. The Black Sea acquires more importance every year. Odessa is its great port; Nikolaieff is the naval arsenal; Sebastopol is a naval station; Batoum exports petroleum.—The Caspian Sea receives the chief Russian river—the Volga—connects Russia with its central Asian dominions and the Caucasus. Finland, Poland, Caucasus, Siberia, and Turkestan being dealt with under those respective headings, what follows relates only to European Russia. The leading feature in its physical structure is a broad, flat swelling about 700 miles wide, with an average height of 800 feet (highest points 1100), which crosses it from south-west to north-east and connects the elevated plains of middle Europe with the Urals. A belt of lowlands stretching from east Prussia to the White Sea fringes this central plateau on the north-west, separating it from the hilly tracts of Finland; while the plains of Bessarabia, Kherson, the Sea of Azov, and the lower Volga limit it on the south-east. The central plateau is diversified by three or four depressions. The Urals, which separate the lowlands of European Russia from those of Siberia, consist of a series of parallel ridges running south-west to north-east, their chief summits reaching 4950–5100 feet high. The chief rivers of Russia take their origin along the north-western border of the plateau, and some of them flow NW., while the others, though describing great curves, trend SE. The Niemen, the Dwina, the Lovat (continued by the Volkhoff and the Neva), and the two chief streams that reach the White Sea, the Onega and the North Dwina, are in the first group; while the Dnieper, the Don, and the Volga belong to the second. The Dniester and the Pruth rise on foreign territory; the Vistula has its mouth in Prussia. By means of three lines of canals and canalised rivers, which connect the upper tributaries of the Volga with the streams that flow into lakes Onega and Ladoga, the outlet of the chief artery of Russia, the Volga, has been transferred from the Caspian to the Gulf of Finland, and St Petersburg is the chief port for the Volga basin. The upper Volga and the upper Kama are also connected by canals with the North Dwina, and the Dnieper with the Düna, the Niemen, and the Vistula. The rainfall all over Russia is small, and as part of it falls in snow, which is rapidly thawed in the spring, the rivers are flooded then and in early summer, and they grow shallow by the autumn. In winter navigation ceases.

All over European Russia, except in the Baltic Provinces, the south of the Crimea, and a narrow strip of land on the Black Sea, the climate is continental. A very cold winter, followed by a spring which sets in rapidly; a hot summer; an autumn cooler than spring; early frosts; and a small rainfall, chiefly during the summer and the autumn, are the main features. The winter is cold everywhere. All over Russia the average temperature of January is below the freezing-point, and it only varies between 22° F. in the west and 5° to 7° in the east. All the rivers are frozen over early in December, and they remain under ice for from 100 days in the south to 160 in the north. In summer the temperature is high all over Russia, and reaches 78° at Astrakhan. The flora of Russia marks four regions: (a) the Arctic tundras are chiefly covered with mosses, lichens, and shrubs. (b) The forest-region, which covers the whole of northern and middle Russia, is either forest-region proper or prairies dotted with forests. The forest-region again is either of coniferous (in the north) or deciduous trees. (c) The Steppes are immense plains covered with grass, and devoid of forests. (d) The flora of the Mediterranean region occupies a narrow strip along the southern coast of the Crimea. The fauna of European Russia is very much like that of middle Europe. Wolves and bears are common in the north. The reindeer is still met with in the north; the wild boar and the bison are each limited to one district; the elk, the lynx, the glutton, the beaver are now very scarce.

The various sections of the country differ much from one another. The Baltic provinces form one section, another is the low-lying Lake Region from the Gulf of Riga to the White Sea. The central plateau contains the most populous agricultural and industrial parts of European Russia. Its physical aspects vary, however, a good deal in the different parts. The Lithuanian provinces of Kovno, Vilna, and part of Grodno and Vitebsk, drained by the Niemen and the upper Dwina, are, on the whole, a very poor region. White Russia, watered by the upper Dnieper and its right-hand tributaries, comprises the governments of Moghileff, Minsk, and southern Vitebsk, as well as parts of Grodno, Vilna, and Smolensk, and is one of the poorest regions of Russia; about one-tenth of the total area is covered with marshes. Little Russia, or the Ukraine, comprising the governments of Tchernigoff, Kieff, Poltava, and part of Kharkoff, as well as Volhynia and Podolia on the spurs of the Carpathians, belongs to the richest and most populous parts of Russia. The soil is mostly a rich black earth, and assumes farther south the aspect of fine grassy steppes, or prairies, yielding rich crops of wheat. Kieff is one of the chief industrial centres of Russia, and woollen cloth mills are rapidly spreading in Podolia. Middle Russia comprises the provinces of Tver, Moscow, Vladimir, Smolensk, Orel, Tula, Kaluga, Kursk, Ryazan, Tamboff, Penza, part of Voronezh, southern Yaroslav, and Simbirsk, peopled at the date of the last census by more than 25,000,000 Great Russians, the density being over 100 per sq. m. Except on its outskirts, this region presents everywhere the same aspects, wide undulating plains covered with cornfields and dotted with small deciduous forests. The soil is of very moderate fertility in the north, but very fertile in the black earth belt of the south. Farther north-east the country is more elevated, but less effectively drained; and vast forests stretch from the upper Volga to the Urals. The governments of Kostroma, Vologda, and Vyatka, together with those parts of Nijni-Novgorod and Kazan which lie on the left bank of the Volga, belong to this domain; and Perm (which includes the mining districts on the Asiatic slope of the Urals) and North Ufa are the chief centres for the iron industry. The Middle Volga governments of Simbirsk, Saratoff, and Samara, and the South Ural governments of South Ufa and Orenburg, belong to a great extent to the steppe-region of south Russia. The Steppe-region occupies a belt more than 200 miles wide along the littoral of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov, and extends eastwards through the region of the lower Volga and Ural till it meets the steppes of central Asia. As far as the eye can reach there are gently undulating plains, clothed with rich grass, and destitute of trees; yet in the deep ravines grow willows, wild cherries, wild apricots, and so forth. The whole is coated with a thick layer of fertile 'black earth.' In the Crimea the soil is a clay impregnated with salt. The Caspian Steppes form a link between Europe and Asia.

The population of the empire embraces a great variety of nationalities; but the Russians, comprising the Velikorusses or Great Russians, the Malorusses or Little Russians, and the Byelorusses or White Russians, are the predominant race. They number 85,000,000—75,000,000 in European Russia. None of the three is a pure race. The Great Russians, who invaded a territory occupied by Finnish tribes, ended by Russianising them. The Little Russians assimilated Turkish tribes, as the White Russians did Lithuanians. The Great Russians inhabit middle Russia in a compact mass of over 35,000,000, and even in east and north Russia they constitute from two-thirds to three-fourths of the population. The Little Russians, over 22,000,000 in all, are settled in Little Russia, which contains also in the borderlands some 12 per cent. of Jews and 6 per cent. of Poles. The White Russians, who number about 6,000,000, dwell in the west, but they are more mixed with Poles, Jews, and Little Russians. The Poles number 7,000,000 in Poland (q.v.), and 1,000,000 in the western governments of Russia. Some 220,000 other Slavs—Servians, Bulgarians, and Bohemians—exist in small colonies in Bessarabia and Kherson. The Letts and the Lithuanians number 2,800,000 in Russia and 300,000 in Poland. Armenians, Kurds, and Persians number 1,300,000, chiefly in Caucasia. The Caucasus (q.v.), inhabited by a great variety of races, has a pop. of 7,500,000. Jews are very numerous in the towns of west Russia (about 3,500,000) and Poland (1,300,000). Nearly three-fourths of the Russian Jews are artisans or factory-workers, while the 30,000 Jews in Bessarabia and Kherson are good agriculturists. The Finnish race includes the Finns and the Karelians (2,400,000 in Finland and 350,000 in European Russia); the Esthonians, the people of Livonia, and other Western Finns in the Baltic Provinces (about 1,000,000); the Lapps and the Samoyedes in the far north; and the Volga Finns and the Ugrians (1,750,000 in European Russia and 50,000 in Siberia). The Eastern Finns are being rapidly absorbed by the Russians; but the Western Finns warmly cherish their nationality. The Turko-Tatars—i.e. Tatars, Bashkirs, Kirghizes, &c.—are mere feeble remnants of the tribes who once conquered Russia. They are 4,500,000 in European Russia, 6,500,000 in central Asia, 2,000,000 in the Caucasus, and 350,000 (Tatars and Yakuts) in Siberia. The Mongol race is represented by 180,000 Kalmucks in Russia and central Asia, as well as by 290,000 Buriats in Siberia; while the Manchurian tribes (Tunguses, &c.) number 70,000 in Siberia (q.v.). Of west Europeans the Germans (about 1,800,000, of whom 500,000 are in Poland) are the most numerous. They have prosperous colonies in south Russia; and in the chief towns there are numbers of German artisans and merchants. The Swedes are 350,000 in Finland. There are, besides, nearly 900,000 Roumanians in south-west Russia, and about 1,000,000 Europeans of various nationalities scattered throughout the empire. The population is rapidly increasing. Great numbers of European Russians emigrate every year to the Asiatic dominions.

The great bulk of the Russians—excepting a few White Russians professing the Union—belong to the Græco-Russian Church, officially styled the Orthodox-Catholic Church, or to one of its numberless sects of dissenters (raskol). The Poles and most of the Lithuanians are Roman Catholics (11,500,000); while the Finns, the Esthonians, and other Western Finns, the Swedes, and the Germans are Protestants (about 6,200,000). Islam claims all the Turko-Tatars, Bashkirs, and Kirghizes. Buddhism has the Kalmucks and the Buriats. Shamanism is the religion of most of the natives of Siberia, as well as of the nominally Christian Mordvins, Votyaks, Tchuvashes, and some Kirghizes. The Voguls, the Samoyedes, and other inhabitants of the far north are fetich worshippers. The Græco-Russian, Roman Catholic, Lutheran, Moslem, Jewish, and Buddhist clergy are maintained or protected by the state. The making of proselytes from the Greek Church is severely punished. To the numerous sects of dissenters, or raskolniks, one-third of the so-called Orthodox Russians belong. The Russian dissenters may be classed under three divisions, all equally numerous: the 'Popovtsy' (who have priests), the 'Bezpopovtsy' (who have none), and the 'Dukhovnyie Khristiane' (spiritualist Christians). The 'Stundist' evangelical movement has spread rapidly in Little Russia.

The political organisation of Russia is a very heterogeneous structure. It has at bottom a great deal of self-government. Till 1905 the empire was an absolute and hereditary monarchy, the final decision in all legislative, executive, and judicial questions resting with the emperor; though a state council discussed measures elaborated by the separate ministries. The imperial authority has been wont to be represented by an army of officials, whose powers are very extensive. In 1905 a constitution and some measure of responsible government was promised. The Duma, a democratic parliament of rather vague powers, met for the first time in 1906, and was soon at feud with the bureaucracy. The several states and territories are ruled each by a governor or governor-general. Finland (q.v.) is substantially a separate state. Four-fifths of the population are 'peasants.' Next come the burghers and the 'merchants' (9 per cent. in European Russia), the clergy (less than 1 per cent.), the nobility (1·3 per cent.), the military (6·1), and foreigners (0·3). The peasants, including the liberated serfs, are grouped in village communes (107,943 in European Russia and Poland); and the assembly of all the householders of the commune, the mir, enjoys a certain degree of self-government. The land being held in common throughout Great Russia and Siberia, it is the mir that periodically distributes the land into allotments. The administration of the economic affairs of the district and the province was in 1866 committed to the district and provincial assemblies or zemstvos. Since 1874 military service has been rendered obligatory upon all able citizens between twenty-one and forty-three. But of the actual total liable every year comparatively few are selected for four years' service (or for infantry and foot artillery three years' service) with the colours; the remainder are inscribed either in the reserve or the militia. In peace the army numbers nearly 1,500,000 men, scattered all over the empire; the war-footing is reckoned at 5,500,000. The navy, almost totally destroyed in the Japanese war of 1904–5, is divided into Baltic and Black Sea fleets, Caspian and Siberian flotillas. There are in the empire, without Finland, about 92,500 elementary schools, with 5½ million pupils; middle schools (classical gymnasiums, Realschulen, &c.), with 700,000 pupils; and higher institutions, of which the eleven universities have over 40,000 students. The language is Slavonic, and the rich and varied literature has become known in western Europe, from Gogol and Pushkin to Turgenief and Tolstoi, as has the music of Balakirev, Borodin, Moussorgsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Glazounov, Tschaikovsky, and Scriabin. The revenue increased from £58,700,000 in 1877 to £300,000,000 in 1912; the debt in 1912 was £947,000,000.

Of European Russia, nearly one-tenth is unproductive and two-fifths are under forests. The remainder is partly meadow or pasture-ground and partly arable. One-third of the registered area is held by the crown, one-third by the peasants' communes, and one-fourth by about half a million private proprietors (most of it by the nobility). Agriculture is the chief occupation of the people of Russia; only in central Russia (Moscow, Vladimir, Nijni) does industry take the lead. The conditions of agriculture are very different in different parts of the country. A line drawn from Kieff to Nijni-Novgorod and Vyatka, will divide the country into two parts, of which the south-eastern has a surplus of wheat and rye and exports them, while the other has to import both. Bad years recur, as in India, at intervals of from ten to twelve years, sometimes followed by severe famine (as in 1891) in many provinces. Flax and hemp are extensively cultivated in the west, the sugar-beet is grown in the south and south-west, and tobacco is produced in the south. The vine is widely cultivated on the Black Sea littoral and in Caucasia. Cotton is widely planted in Turkestan. The empire is very rich in all kinds of minerals. Gold is obtained in Siberia and the Ural Mountains. Silver and lead are obtained in Siberia, the Kirghiz Steppes, the Caucasus, and Finland; platinum in the Urals. Iron ores are found in profusion both in the Asiatic dominions and in European Russia. Zinc is mined in Poland, tin in Finland, cobalt and manganese in Caucasia, and copper in Siberia. Salt is obtained from salt-lakes. Russia has excellent coal-basins, especially in the Don region. The rich oil-wells of Baku, Maikop, &c. supply Russia with petroleum. In 1912 the manufactories of the empire employed about 2,000,000 workmen. Leading industries are the making of cotton, linen, silk, and beet-sugar, distilling, brewing, tanning, shoe-making, and the manufacture of furniture, paper, and tobacco. The chief industrial centres are Moscow and the surrounding governments, St Petersburg, and Poland. The woollen trade is taking firm root in the south. The production of alcohol (chiefly vodka, the national spirit) averages about 120 million gallons every year. There are about 280 sugar-mills and nearly 3000 distilleries in Russia. The domestic industries, which are carried on by the peasants of central Russia along with agriculture, are of much greater importance in Russia than in western Europe. Some 8,000,000 peasants are engaged in these domestic trades, including wood-carving, metal-work, and the like. The exports to foreign countries consist principally of corn and flour (about half of the total exports), various articles of food (butter, eggs, &c.), flax, timber, linseed, raw wool, naphtha, and illuminating oils, and reach an annual value of £70,000,000 to £100,000,000. The imports (about £100,000,000) consist chiefly of raw cotton (£7,000,000 to £12,000,000), tea, raw metals, machinery, raw wool, colours, iron and steel goods, coal, coffee, wine, and fruit; the manufactured goods imported may amount to £40,000,000. The exports to Great Britain, which were £26,315,000 in 1888, were £35,600,000 in 1911; the imports, £4,810,000 in the former year, were £16,300,000 in the latter. The ports of Russia are entered every year by about 14,000 vessels of 14 million tons, of which only 1100 to 1900 (chiefly belonging to Finns or Greeks) sail under the Russian flag. The importance of the Russian rivers for traffic has already been mentioned. About 1860 Russia had less than 1000 miles of railways; but in 1910 she had a network measuring 45,000 miles, exclusive of Finland, out of which 10,500 miles are in Asiatic Russia. Nine-tenths of the cost has been defrayed by the state by means of loans. The Siberian railway to Vladivostok was completed in September 1904 by the opening of the Baikal section; and the Orenburg-Tashkend line was finished in 1905. Another line runs from Krasnovodsk to Merv, Samarkand, and Tashkend.

The Russian monarchy is traced to the Varangian or Northman Rurik. Vladimir and his people were baptised at Kieff in 988. In the 13th century befell the terrible Mongol invasion; from 1240 to 1480 the Russian princes paid tribute to the Mongol-Tatar Khans. Ivan the Great (1462–1505) expelled the Mongols, and made Moscow the capital of an important state, extending to the White Sea. Ivan the Terrible (1533–84) extended his dominions to the Black Sea and well into Siberia. Peter the Great (1689–1725) planted Russia firmly on the Baltic. Under Catharine II. (1762–96) great acquisitions were made at the expense of Poland, Turkey, Persia, and Sweden; next century Russia, besides annexing the Caucasus, made vast extensions of her territory in central Asia and eastern Siberia; so that now she nearly touches British India, marches with China, and has a naval station at Vladivostok on the Sea of Japan. But the too great energy of the 'forward party' in the Far East provoked Japanese suspicions; the practical annexation of Manchuria and intrigues in Corea led to the Japanese war of 1904–5, in which the fortress of Port Arthur fell, and Russian armies were repeatedly defeated in great battles and forced gradually to retreat. Peace was made in 1905, only after violent agitation had begun at home for a constitution and greater personal freedom, attended by strikes, riots, mutinies, revolutionary risings, and massacres of the Jews.

Rustchuk (u as oo), or RUSSE (the old form revived in 1892), a town of Bulgaria, on the Danube's south bank, opposite Giurgevo, 14 miles by rail NW. of Varna (on the Black Sea) and 40 S. by W. of Bucharest. It was captured by the Russians in 1810 and 1877, and played a prominent part in the Russo-Turkish wars of 1773–90 and 1853–54; and, until its fortifications were dismantled, possessed considerable strategic importance. Pop. 36,000.

Rutherglen (u as in cut, th as in this; popularly Ruglen), a town in Lanarkshire, on the Clyde, 3 miles SE. of Glasgow, with whose eastern extremity it is connected by a bridge, built in 1890–91 at a cost of £29,000. Its principal building is a handsome town-hall (1862). Rutherglen was the seat of a royal castle, which was captured by Edward Bruce about 1313, burned by Moray in 1568, and finally demolished in the 18th century. At Rutherglen, in 1679, the Covenanters published a 'Declaration'—the prelude to Drumclog and Bothwell Bridge. A royal burgh since 1126, it unites with Kilmarnock, &c. to return one member to parliament. Pop. (1831) 4741; (1861) 8062; (1911) 24,319. See Ure's History of Rutherglen (1793).

Ruthin (Roothin), a town of Denbighshire, on the Clwyd, 8 miles SSE. of Denbigh by rail. The 13th-century castle which gave it name (Cym. rhyd-din, 'red fortress'), surrendered in 1646 to the Roundheads, and was afterwards dismantled, part of its site being now occupied by a castellated mansion. A grammar-school (1594) was reconstituted in 1881; and there are also an interesting collegiate church, a county hall, a corn exchange, &c. Chartered by Henry VII. in 1507, Ruthin unites with Denbigh, &c. to return one member. Pop. (municipal borough), 2800. See Newcome's Castle and Town of Ruthin (2d ed. 1836).

Ruthven Castle. See HUNTINGTOWER.

Ruthwell (th as in this; locally Rĭ'well), a Dumfriesshire coast parish, 9 miles ESE. of Dumfries. Its famous sandstone cross, 17¾ feet high, bears carvings in front and behind of the Crucifixion, Annunciation, &c., with Latin inscriptions, and on the sides of scroll-work, English runic verses from 'The Dream of the Rood.' Dating possibly from about 680 A.D., the cross was cast down and broken in 1642 as a monument of idolatry; but in 1802 was re-erected in the manse garden by the Rev. Henry Duncan, minister of Ruthwell, and founder of savings' banks; and in 1887 was removed to an apse adjoining the church.

Rutlam, a native state in the Western Malwa agency, Central India. Area, 729 sq. m.; pop. 89,160. The capital, Rutlam, is a great opium mart, and has a college; pop. 31,000.

Rutland, the smallest county in England, bounded by Leicester, Lincoln, and Northampton shires. It measures 18 by 15 miles, and has an area of 152 sq. m. or 97,273 acres. The Guash or Wash, flowing to the Welland (which traces the south-east boundary), divides it into two portions—the northern a somewhat elevated tableland, while the southern consists of a number of valleys running east and west, and separated by low hills. Half the whole area is permanent pasture, and woods occupy some 3000 acres. Towns are Oakham and Uppingham, and there are fifty-one parishes. Rutland gives the title of duke to the family of Manners. Its representation was reduced to one in 1885. Pop. (1801) 16,380; (1861) 21,861; (1901) 19,709; (1911) 20,346.

Rutland, capital of Rutland county, Vermont, on Otter Creek, close to the Green Mountains, 67 miles by rail SSE. of Burlington. The chief industry is the quarrying and working of marble; the place has also foundries and railroad shops. From 1784 to 1804 it was one of the capitals of Vermont. Pop. 13,500.

Rütli, or GRÜTLI, a meadow on the west side of the southern arm of Lake Lucerne; here the men of Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden took the oath (1307) to drive out the Austrians. It is national property, having been purchased with the pence of Swiss school children, and is adorned with a monument (1860) to Schiller, and with another (1884) in commemoration of the oath.

Ruvo in Apulia (anc. Rubi), a cathedral city of S. Italy, 22 miles W. of Bari. Pop. 30,000.

Ruwenzo'ri, a mountain in the centre of Africa, just north of the Equator, between Lakes Albert and Edward. It was discovered by Baker in 1871, and many of its peaks (ranging up to 16,800 feet) were climbed by the Duke of the Abruzzi in 1906.

Ruysselede (Roissehlay'deh), a Belgian town, 14 miles SE. of Bruges, has a large reformatory for boys (1849). Pop. 8000.

Ryan, LOCH, a Wigtownshire arm of the sea, extending 8 miles SSE. to Stranraer from the Firth of Clyde, with a breadth of from 1½ to almost 3 miles.

Rybinsk (Ree-binsk'), a town of Russia, on the Volga's right bank, 48 miles NW. of Yaroslav. It has a very large trade in forwarding to the capital by canal the goods brought hither by large vessels up the Volga. Boat-building, rope-making, brewing, and distilling are industries. Pop. 25,000, increased to 125,000 in summer.

Rydal Mount, Westmorland, 1½ mile NNW. of Ambleside, was Wordsworth's thirty-seven years' residence, and his death-place.

Ryde, a flourishing and fashionable watering-place on the north-east coast of the Isle of Wight, 4½ miles SSW. of Portsmouth, from which it is separated by the roadstead of Spithead. It consists of Upper and Lower Ryde, the former occupying the site of an ancient village, La Rye or La Riche, destroyed by the French in 1377, and the latter of quite modern construction. Fielding in 1753 described Ryde as 'a pleasant village, separated at low-water from the sea by an impassable gulf of mud;' but now there are excellent sands, and the appearance of the town with its streets and villas interspersed with trees is pleasing and picturesque. The longer of the two piers (768 feet) was constructed in 1813–61; of the buildings may be noticed the town-hall (1831); All Saints' Church (1870), by Scott, with a spire 173 feet high; St Mary's Roman Catholic Church (1846), by Hansom; the Royal Victoria Yacht Club-house (1847); and the Royal Isle of Wight Infirmary. Ryde was made a municipal borough in 1868. Pop. 10,600.

Rye, a decayed seaport of Sussex, 11 miles NE. of Hastings, and 2 miles inland now owing to the retirement of the sea. It stands on an eminence bounded east by the Rother, south and west by the Tillingham, and presents a quaint, old-world aspect. On a rock overlooking the confluence of the streams is the 12th-century Ypres Tower (now a police station); the church, mainly Norman and Early English in style, and one of the largest in the kingdom, was restored in 1883. Then there are the old Land Gate, a former Carmelite chapel, and a grammar-school (1638). The Novus Portus of Ptolemy, Rye was granted by the Confessor to Fécamp Abbey, and by Henry III. was made a Cinque Port. It became a Huguenot asylum after 1562 and 1685 (Thackeray's Denis Duval is laid here); and it returned two members till 1832, and then one till 1885. Fletcher the dramatist was a native. Pop. 4200. See Holloway's History of Rye (1847).

Rye House, an old Hertfordshire mansion, 5¼ miles SE. of Hertford, where it was proposed by some of the Whigs to waylay and assassinate Charles II. (1683).

Ryswick, a village 2 miles S. of the Hague, where in 1697 a great treaty of peace was signed between France, England, the Netherlands, Spain, and Germany.

Ryton, a Durham town, on the Tyne, 6 miles W. of Newcastle. Pop. 13,000.

Rzheff. See RSHEFF.

SAALE (Sâh-leh), a navigable river of Germany, rises in the Fichtelgebirge (Bavaria), and flows 226 miles northward through Thuringia and Prussian Saxony to the Elbe above Magdeburg.

Saalfeld (Sâhl'felt), a town of Saxe-Meiningen, on the Saale, 31 miles SSW. of Jena. Pop. 14,000.

Saarbrück (Sâhr-brük), or SAARBRÜCKEN, a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Saar, 40 miles SE. of Trèves, is the centre of a coalfield, and manufactures iron, glass, tobacco, chemicals, &c. Pop. 105,000. Here, on 2d August 1870, in the first engagement of the Franco-German war, the Germans retreated.

Saardam. See ZAANDAM.

Saargemünd (Sahr-ge-münt'; Fr. Sarregue- mines), a town of Lorraine, 41 miles E. of Metz, making pottery, silk, and velvet. Pop. 15,400.

Saarlouis (Sahr-loo-ee'), a former fortress of Rhenish Prussia, on the Saar, 31 miles S. of Trèves. Fortified by Vauban, it was in 1815 given from France to Prussia by the Congress of Vienna. Here Ney was born. Pop. 9000.

Saaz (Sâhtz), a town of Bohemia, on the Eger, 66 miles by rail NW. of Prague. Pop. 25,000.

Saba (Sâh'ba), a Dutch West Indian island (Leewards), 40 miles NW. of St Kitts; a volcanic cone, 1500 feet high. Area, 5 sq. m.; pop. 2000.

Sabadell', a town of Spain, 14 miles by railway NW. of Barcelona, the 'Manchester of Catalonia,' manufacturing woollens and cottons. Pop. 28,000.

Sabine (Sa-been'), a river of Texas and Louisiana, flowing 500 miles SE. and S. until through Sabine Lake (18 miles long by 9 wide) it empties into the Gulf of Mexico.

Sable Island, a low-lying sandy island in the Atlantic, in 44° N. lat. and 60° W. long., 85 miles E. of Nova Scotia (and not near Cape Sable, at the SE. corner of Nova Scotia, where there is also a Sable Island). On this dangerous 'Ocean Graveyard,' the Canadian government has established six life-saving stations, with life-boats, rockets, &c., and a staff of men. In 1802 Sable Island was 40 miles long; in 1890 it was reduced to 20 miles; in 1900 over 80,000 trees were planted to check the shifting of the sands.

Sables D'Olonne (Sâhbl-d'O-lon'), Les, a French seaport and watering-place (dep. Vendée), on the Atlantic, 50 miles S. by W. of Nantes, with salt-making, shipbuilding, and fishing. Pop. 12,000.

Sabri'na Land, believed to have been discovered in the Antarctic (at 100° E. long.) by Balleny in 1839, was proved non-existent in 1911–1913.—Sabrina is the Latin form of SEVERN.

Sachsen. See SAXONY, SAXON STATES.

Sacketts Harbor, a summer-resort (in 1812 an important naval station) of New York, on a bay of Lake Ontario, at the mouth of Black River, 12 miles by rail W. of Watertown. Pop. 900.

Saco (Saw'ko), a port of Maine, 16 miles by rail WSW. of Portland, on the Saco River, here crossed by a bridge to Biddeford, with falls of 50 feet supplying water-power for cotton and shoe factories, sawmills, machine-shops, &c. Pop. 6600.—The Saco River rises in the White Mountains of New Hampshire, and runs 170 miles SE. through Maine to the Atlantic.

Sacramento, the largest river of California, rises in the NE. part of the state, its head-stream, Pitt River, draining Goose Lake, and flows 500 miles SW., S., and SSW. to Suisun Bay, through which its waters pass into San Pablo Bay and so to the Pacific. It is navigable for small vessels to Red Bluff, nearly 250 miles. Near its mouth it receives the San Joaquin.

Sacramento, capital of California, is on the east bank of the Sacramento River, at the mouth of American River, 90 miles by boat and rail NE. of San Francisco. The principal public buildings are the state capitol (cost $2,000,000), county court-house (formerly capitol) and hospital, post-office, a Roman Catholic cathedral, the Crocker Art Gallery, and Masonic and Oddfellows' halls. Here are flour and planing mills, carriage, box, and broom factories, foundries, potteries, spice-mills, canneries, and the shops of the Southern Pacific Railroad. Inundations led to the building of a levee in 1862. Sacramento was settled in 1839; but it was not laid out till 1848, after the discovery of gold. In 1854 it became state capital. Pop. 45,000.

Saddleback, or BLENCATH'ARA, a Cumberland mountain (2847 feet), 4¼ miles NE. of Keswick.

Sad'owa. See KÖNIGGRÄTZ.

Safed, a town of Palestine, 6 miles NW. of the Lake of Tiberias, famous as a stronghold of the crusaders and of the Knights Templars, lost after much fighting in 1266. It is still one of the four holy cities of the Jews, and has a pop. of 25,000, most of whom are Jews.

Saffi, or ASFI, a seaport of Morocco, stands on a little bay on the Atlantic coast, 120 miles WNW. of the city of Morocco. Pop. 9000.

Saffron-Walden, a municipal borough of Essex, 15 miles S. of Cambridge, 27 NNW. of Chelmsford, and 45 by a branch-line (1865) NNE. of London. The saffron crocus was formerly cultivated here. The parish church (Perpendicular) has a spire 108 feet high, and brasses and monuments—one to Lord Chancellor Audley (1488–1544). There are also remains of a Norman castle, a corn exchange (1848), a town-hall (1879), a cattle-market (1834), and a grammar-school, founded in 1423. Audley End, 1½ mile SW., the seat of Lord Braybrooke, was built in 1603 by Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk, and is still a magnificent mansion, though partly demolished since 1701. Population, 6300. See works by Lord Braybrooke (1836) and John Player (1845).

Sagaing, a decayed town of Burma, once the capital, lies on the Irawadi, opposite Ava.

Sagan, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Bober, 33 miles by rail W. by S. of Glogau, manufacturing cottons and woollens, beer, &c. Pop. 15,000.

Sagar, or SAUGOR, a well-built town in the Central Provinces of India, in a hilly tract, on a feeder of the Jumna, with barracks, magazine, jail (1846), and park (1862). Pop. 44,674.

Sagar, a low, swampy, sacred island (area, 225 sq. m.), at the mouth of the Hooghly, with a lighthouse (1808) and telegraph station.

Saghalien, or SAKHALIN (Sa-ha-leen'; Japanese Karafuto), is a long (670 miles) and narrow (20 to 150 miles) island, running N. and S., off the east coast of the Maritime Province of Siberia. Owing to the vicinity of the misty, chilly Sea of Okhotsk, to the ice-floes off the east coast, and to the dense forests on the mountains (5000 feet), the rainfall is heavy and the climate is raw and cold. The streams and the adjoining seas teem with fish. Petroleum, gold, and naphtha exist, and coal is mined. Area, 29,550 sq. m.; pop. of Russian Sakhalin, 14,000—Russians, Gilyaks, and Ainos; of Japanese Sakhalin, 36,000. In 1875 the Japanese were compelled to cede the southern part to Russia (in exchange for some of the Kuriles), and the whole was for a time a great Russian convict settlement. But in 1905, after the Russo-Japanese war, the Japanese resumed possession of the southern half.

Saginaw', the third city of Michigan, and capital of Saginaw county, is built on an elevated plateau on the Saginaw River, 108 miles by rail NNW. of Detroit. It manufactures flour, salt, lumber, barrels, sashes, doors, and blinds, &c., and exports lumber and salt. There was a great fire in May 1893. Population, 50,500.—SAGINAW BAY, an arm of Lake Huron, is 60 miles long by 30 wide, and has several fine harbours. The river Saginaw (30 miles) falls into it.

Saguenay (Sa-gay-nay'), a large river of Canada, falling into the St Lawrence estuary on the north side, 115 miles below Quebec. It drains Lake St John, and flows almost straight 100 miles ESE. In its upper part, amid a wilderness of hills, it has numerous cataracts; but in the lower course, from the village of Chicoutimi down, it flows between precipitous cliffs, often 500 to 1500 feet high, and is in many places 2 or 3 miles broad, while the depth varies from 17 to 170, and even, near the mouth, to 500 fathoms. The largest vessels can ascend to near Chicoutimi; and great numbers of tourists visit the river.

Saguntum. See MURVIEDRO.

Sahara (usually Sa-hah'ra, properly Sah'a-ra; Arab. Sáh'ra), the vast desert region of North Africa, stretching from the Atlantic to the Nile, and from the southern confines of Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli southwards to near the Niger and Lake Chad. The Libyan Desert, lying between Egypt, the central Soudan, and Tripoli, is a separate tract. The surface, instead of being uniform and depressed below sea-level, is highly diversified, and attains in one place an altitude of fully 8000 feet. From Cape Blanco in the west, the Erg, a vast semicircle of sand-dunes (50 to 300 miles wide and 70 to 300 feet high), stretches right round the northern side of the Sahara to Fezzan. In the centre the country rises into the lofty plateau of Ahaggar (4000 feet), with veritable mountains 6500 feet high, and actually covered with snow for three months in the year. There are mountain-ranges in the east reaching 8000 feet. The mountainous parts embrace many deep valleys, most of them seamed with the dry beds of ancient rivers, which yield abundance of water, if not on the surface, then a short distance below it, and are inhabited, and grazed by cattle, sheep, and camels. Another characteristic type of Saharan landscape is a low plateau strewn with rough blocks of granite and other rocks, and perfectly barren. These elevated stone-fields, called 'hammada,' alternate with tracts of bare flat sand, with broad marshes, where water has stood and evaporated, leaving salt behind it, and with extensive tracts of small, polished, smoothly-rounded stones. In very many parts of the Sahara, especially in the valleys of the mountainous parts, in the recesses or bays at the foot of the hills, alongside the watercourses, and in the hollows of the sand-dunes, there are oases—habitable, cultivable, watered spots. Lines of oases mark the great caravan-routes between the Soudan states and the Mediterranean.

A large portion of the Sahara, though not the whole, was undoubtedly under water at one time; and a process of desiccation has been going on throughout the whole region from the earliest historic time; the Romans had colonies or military posts a long way to the south. The sand is simply the Saharan rocks (granite, gneiss, mica-schists, and cretaceous rocks) crumbled to dust by the alternations of heat and cold. The range of temperature is exceedingly great: often the thermometer falls from more than 100° F. during the day to just below freezing-point at night. Rain does fall in certain districts at intervals of two to five years. After a fall of rain it is not unusual to see the river-beds in the mountainous regions filled with foaming torrents. Owing to the extreme dryness of the air, the Sahara is very healthy. The plant-life is very rich in the oases, the date-palm, oranges, lemons, peaches, figs, pomegranates, &c., being grown, with cereals, rice, durrha, and millet. In the desert regions are found tamarisks, prickly acacias and similar thorny shrubs and trees, salsolaceæ, and coarse grasses. The animals include, besides the camel, horse, ox, sheep, and goat, the giraffe, antelopes, wild cattle, the wild ass, desert fox, jackal, hare, lion, ostrich, desert lark, crow, viper, python, locusts, flies. The inhabitants, estimated at between 1,400,000 and 2,500,000, consist of Moors, Tuareg, Tibbu, Negroes, Arabs, and Jews. The chief products are dates and salt, also horses, soda, and saltpetre. A very active trade is carried on by caravans, between the central Soudan and Niger countries and the Mediterranean states, the ivory, ostrich-feathers, gums, spices, musk, hides, gold-dust, indigo, cotton, palm-oil, shea-butter, kola-nuts, ground-nuts, silver, dates, salt, and alum of the interior lands being exchanged for European manufactures. The French have proposed various trans-Saharan railway schemes, and have built a railway from Dakar and St Louis to the Niger. Their ambition of uniting their possessions on the Senegal and on the Niger with Algeria and Tunis was accomplished by the agreements of 1890–1904 between Great Britain and France, by which the whole of the Sahara west of the Nile basin was recognised as French, except those portions of the Atlantic coast which belonged to Morocco, Spain, and Great Britain. In 1912 Morocco itself became a French protectorate, Spanish claims to the Ifni coast being acknowledged by France. French Sahara, in addition to the Saharan regions of Morocco, Algeria, and Tunis, includes the territory of Mauritania, or Maurétanie, and much of the colonies of Senegal and Upper Senegal-Niger; and continuous French territory stretches to the coasts of French Guinea, Dahomey, and, but for a slight interruption made by cession to Germany in 1911, Gabun. Italy gained a footing in the Sahara by the conquest of Tripoli (1911–12). There have been schemes for flooding the low-lying 'shotts' south of Tunis, and much has been done towards improving certain areas by boring artesian wells and so irrigating the country around. See German works by Barth (1858), Nachtigal (1879–89), Rohlfs (1874), Zittel (1884), and Lenz (1884); French works by Rolland, Cat, Bissuel, Vuillot, Toutée, Schirmer, Bonnefon, and Foureau (1891–1905); English by Somerville (Phila. 1901) and Vischer (1910).

Saharanpur', a town of the United Provinces of India, 125 miles by rail N. of Delhi, is the station for the sanatorium of Masuri (Mussoorie). It has an old Rohilla fort, a new mosque, St Thomas' Church (1858), and botanical gardens (1817). Pop. 66,000.

Saida. See SIDON.

Saigon (Să-gon$^{g\prime}$), capital of French Cochin-China, stands on the river Saigon, a deltaic mouth of the Mekong, 60 miles from the sea. The French town has grown up since 1861, with its fine streets, squares, and boulevards. It has a magnificent governor's palace, a cathedral (1877), two higher colleges, an arsenal, a floating-dock and a dry-dock, and a botanical and zoological garden. Its population, consisting principally of Chinese, Annamese, and French, amounts to 65,000; while the business suburb of Cholon, 4 miles SW., has about 200,000 inhabitants, more than a third of them Chinese. It exports rice, fish, salt, cotton, wood, beans, and hides.

St Abbs, a seaside resort and fishing-village in Berwickshire, 2½ miles SE. of St Abb's Head (and formerly called Coldingham Shore).

St Abb's Head, a rocky promontory (310 feet) of Berwickshire, 4 miles NNW. of Eyemouth. Here is a lighthouse (1861).

St Affrique (San^{g}t Affreek'), a town of the French dep. of Aveyron, 56 miles NW. of Montpellier. Pop. 5000.

St Agnes, a town of Cornwall, on the Bristol Channel, 9 miles NW. of Truro. Pop. of parish, 3900. See also SCILLY ISLANDS.

St Albans, a city of Hertfordshire, 20 miles NNW. of London, on the top and northern slope of an eminence washed by the Ver, one of the chief feeders of the Colne, across which stood Verulamium. That important Roman station is perhaps identical with the fortress of Cassivellaunus, destroyed in 54 B.C. by Cæsar, and was taken by Boadicea in 61 A.D. In honour of the protomartyr Alban, said to have been beheaded here about 303, Offa, king of Mercia, in 793 founded a great Benedictine abbey, which from Pope Adrian IV. (born, Nicolas Breakspear, at Bedmond, 3 miles SW.) obtained precedence over all other abbeys in England. Rebuilt after 1077 with flat Roman tiles from Verulam, and dedicated in 1115 in the presence of Henry I., the abbey church, in spite of successive alterations (Early English, Decorated, Perpendicular), is still 'the vastest and sternest' of early Norman structures, its exterior length (548 feet) being second only to Winchester's, whilst the transepts measure 189 feet across, and the massive central tower is 144 feet high. It was made the cathedral of a new diocese in 1877, and in 1871–85 was very thoroughly restored. Special features are the substructure of the shrine of St Alban (its 2000 shattered fragments pieced together), the tombs of Duke Humphrey of Gloucester and 'Sir John Mandeville,' the superb presbytery reredos, and Abbot Ramryge's chantry. Of the forty abbots down to the Dissolution in 1539 the greatest was Cardinal Wolsey; and among the monks were Matthew Paris, Roger Wendover, Rishanger, and the other compilers of the Chronica Monasterii S. Albani, which, like the Treatise of Dame Juliana Berners, was printed here at Abbot Wallingford's press. The abbey gatehouse was in 1869 converted from a jail to the purposes of King Edward VI.'s grammar-school, which till then had occupied the Lady Chapel. In St Michael's Church is Lord Bacon's monument; the 15th-century clock-tower was restored in 1864; and a drinking-fountain marks the site of an Eleanor's cross, demolished in 1702. There are almshouses founded by the famous Duchess of Marlborough, a town-hall (1832), a corn exchange (1857), and a free library (1880). The industries include straw-plaiting, brewing, boot and brush making, and silk-manufacture. St Albans, disfranchised for bribery in 1852, was incorporated by Edward VI. in 1553, and had its municipal boundary extended in 1879. It was the scene of two battles in the Wars of the Roses—the first, on 22d May 1455, a victory for the Yorkists; the second, on 17th February 1461, for the Lancastrians. Population, 18,000. See works by Newcome (1793), Williams (1822), Comyns Carr (1877), James Neale (1878), and Ashdown (1894).

St Alban's Head. See DORSETSHIRE.

St Amand (San^{g}t Amon^{g}'), a town of France (dep. Cher), on the Cher, 25 miles SSE. of Bourges, with ironworks and potteries; pop. 8000.

St Amand-les-Eaux (San^{g}t Amon^{g}'-leh-Zo), a town of France, dep. Nord, 8 miles NW. of Valenciennes, with hot sulphur-springs and a ruined abbey. Pop. 10,000.

St Andrews, a city of Fife, stands on a rocky plateau at the edge of St Andrews Bay, 42 miles NNE. of Edinburgh. The monkish legend, long discredited, assigned its ecclesiastical origin to St Regulus or Rule, who, warned in a dream, brought certain bones of St Andrew from Patras in the 4th century, and was wrecked at Muckros, afterwards called Kilrimont, now St Andrews. There is, however, reason for believing not only that those relics were brought in the 8th century, but that, before the end of the 6th, Cainnech or Kenneth, the patron saint of Kilkenny, had founded a monastery at Rig-Monadh, the Royal Mount, and that thus arose the name of Kilrimont. Early in the 10th century it seemingly became the seat of the 'Ardepscop Albain,' the high bishop of the Scots—archbishop from 1471–72. The Augustinian Priory, founded in 1144, was the richest and greatest of all the religious houses of Scotland. The Cathedral, founded in or about 1160 in presence of Malcolm IV., and consecrated in 1318 in presence of Robert the Bruce, was stripped of its images and ornaments in 1559, and afterwards fell into ruin. The extreme length inside is 355 feet. The Bishop's Palace or Castle, first built in 1200, was frequently demolished and rebuilt, and is now a ruin. George Wishart was confined in its 'bottle-dungeon,' and Cardinal Beaton slain within its massive walls. None of the ruins is less imposing or more interesting than the foundations on the Kirkhill—the site of the Celtic church. St Rule's Tower, 108 feet high, is Romanesque, probably of the 10th century. The schools of St Andrews were noted in 1120; but the University, the first in Scotland, dates only from 1411. St Salvator's College was founded in 1455, St Leonard's in 1512, and St Mary's in 1537. The two first were united in 1747. The average attendance of students is under 400. The library contains over 100,000 volumes, and there is a good museum. The parish church of St Leonard's is roofless, and the congregation worships in the beautiful chapel of St Salvator's. The Madras College (1832) was endowed by Dr Andrew Bell. There is also a large girls' school (St Leonard's). The town was made a free burgh between 1144 and 1153; the St Andrews Burghs, returning one member, are St Andrews, the two Anstruthers, Crail, Cupar, Kilrenny, and Pittenweem. The manufacture of golf-clubs and balls is a thriving industry, St Andrews, with its fine links, being the Mecca of golfers. Population, 8000. See works by Martine (1787–97), Grierson (1807), Lyon (1843), Rogers (1849), Anderson (1878), Andrew Lang (1894), and Hay Fleming (1894).

St Annes on the Sea, a watering-place of N. Lancashire, 4½ miles S. of Blackpool; pop. 10,000.

St Asaph, a little cathedral city of Flintshire, North Wales, on an eminence between the rivers Elwy and Clwyd, 6 miles SSE. of Rhyl. The cathedral, 182 feet long, is the smallest in the kingdom, and, rebuilt after 1284, is a plain, cruciform, red sandstone structure, mainly Decorated in style, with a massive central tower 93 feet high, fine oak stalls, and a tablet to Mrs Hemans, who lived here 1809–28. It was restored by Scott in 1867–75. St Kentigern is said to have founded about 560 a bishopric at Llanelwy, renamed St Asaph after his favourite disciple. Among sixty-five bishops since 1143 have been Reginald Pecock; Isaac Barrow the elder; Lloyd, one of the Seven Bishops; and Horsley. St Asaph has a grammar-school, founded about 1600, and rebuilt in 1882. It is one of the eight Flint parliamentary boroughs. Pop. 1800. See works by Browne Willis (1719), Freeman (1850), R. J. King (1873), and D. R. Thomas (1888).

St Aug′ustine, an ancient Spanish town on the east coast of Florida, now the capital of St John's county, stands on Matanzas Sound, 2 miles from the Atlantic and 37 by rail SSE. of Jacksonville. It was founded in 1565, and is the oldest town in the United States. Its mild and equable climate renders it a favourite winter-resort for invalids. It has a Roman Catholic cathedral (rebuilt after the fire of 1887), a Peabody Institute, and huge and really handsome hotels. Pop. 5500, increased to 10,000 in winter.

St Austell, a town of Cornwall, 14 miles NE. of Truro and 1½ NW. of the head of St Austell Bay. China-clay, tin, and copper are worked in the vicinity. The interesting church (13th to 16th century) was restored in 1870. Pilchard-fishing is carried on in St Austell Bay. Pop. 3400.

St Bartholomew, or St Barthélemy, a French West Indian island, 190 miles E. of Porto Rico. Area, 8 sq. m.; pop. 3000. The treeless surface rises to 1003 feet; the climate is very dry. French in 1648–1784, and Swedish till 1877, the island was bought back by France for £16,000.

St Bees, a Cumberland watering-place, 4½ miles S. of Whitehaven by rail and 3 SE. of St Bees Head (300 feet). A nunnery founded here about 650 A.D. by an Irish princess, St Begha, appears to have been destroyed by the Danes, and to have been reconstituted as a Benedictine priory in the reign of Henry I. St Bees Theological College, established in 1816 by Dr Law, Bishop of Chester, was closed in 1896; a grammar-school, founded by Archbishop Grindall in 1587, was reconstituted in 1881. Pop. of parish, 1400.

St Bernard, two mountain-passes in the Alps. (1) Great St Bernard (8120 feet) is on the road between Aosta in Piedmont and Martigny in Valais. Almost on its crest stands the Augustinian hospice founded in 962 by Bernard de Menthon for the benefit of pilgrims journeying to Rome. A temple of Jupiter at the top was excavated in 1890.—(2) Little St Bernard, SW. of the above in the Graian Alps, connects the valley of Aosta with that of Tarantaise in Savoy. By this pass Hannibal is believed to have led his forces into Italy. It too has a hospice, 7143 feet above the sea.

St Blazey, a town of Cornwall, 4 miles ENE. of St Austell. Pop. of parish, 3000.

St Boswells, or Lessudden, a Roxburghshire village, near the Tweed's right bank, 4 miles SE. of Melrose. Pop. 600.

St Brieuc (San^{g} Bree-uh′), a town of Brittany, capital of the dep. of Côtes du Nord, on the Gouet, 2 miles from its mouth in the English Channel, and 93 E. of Brest. It has a port, Le Légué, at the river's mouth; a cathedral, dating from the 13th century; the ruined Tour de Cesson (1395; blown up 1598); and a lyceum, with a library of 37,000 volumes. Pop. 20,000.

St Catherine's, a city of Ontario, on the Welland Canal, 5 miles S. of Port Dalhousie on Lake Ontario. It manufactures machinery, and has mineral springs. Pop. 12,500.

St Chamond (San^{g} Sha-mon^{g}), a town of France, dep. Loire, 7 miles NE. of St Étienne by rail, manufactures ribbons, silks, and iron, and has coal-pits. Pop. 15,000.

St Charles, capital of St Charles county, Missouri, on the high north bank of the Missouri River, 23 miles by rail (44 by river) NW. of St Louis. It has flour-mills, a railroad-car factory, and large bridge-building works. Pop. 9400.

St Christopher, popularly St Kitts, one of the Leeward group of the West India Islands, belonging to Great Britain, lies 45 miles NW. of Guadeloupe. It is long (23 miles) and narrow (5 miles), and is traversed by a chain of rugged mountains (Mount Misery, 4100 feet); area, 68 sq. m. The capital is Basse-terre (q.v.). Principal products are sugar, molasses, rum, salt, coffee, cocoa, tobacco, and cattle. Administratively St Kitts is united with Nevis (q.v.) and the little island of Anguilla. Population, 26,300. This island was discovered in 1493 by Columbus, and named from a resemblance of its outline to statues of his patron saint. Colonised by French and British in 1625, it became English in 1713.

St Clair, a navigable river of North America, in the line of the Great Lakes, and carrying into Lake St Clair the waters of Lake Huron. It is over 40 miles long, and ½ mile broad. In 1891 a railway tunnel under its bed was completed between Port Huron, Michigan, and Sarnia, Ontario, 20 feet in diameter, and 6026 (including excavated approaches, 11,553) feet long. Lake St Clair is 26 miles long and 25 wide, has an area of 410 sq. m., and from its south-west end discharges into Lake Erie through the Detroit.

St Clair, a borough of Pennsylvania, 5 miles N. of Pottsville, with anthracite mines. Pop. 5600.

St Claude, a town in the French dep. of Jura, 30 miles SE. of Lons-le-Saunier. The monastery here dates from 430 A.D. Pop. 10,000.

St Clears, a river-port of Carmarthenshire, at the head of the Taf estuary, 8 miles WSW. of Carmarthen. Pop. of parish, 930.

St Cloud (San^{g} Kloo), a town of France, dep. Seine-et-Oise, on an eminence near the Seine, 10 miles W. of Paris. Henry III. was assassinated here in 1589 by the fanatical monk Jacques Clément. St Cloud was long famous for its magnificent château, built by Louis XIV.'s brother, the Duke of Orleans, which Napoleon made his favourite residence. It was destroyed, and its magnificent park (in which stands the Sèvres porcelain-factory) injured, during the siege of Paris, in 1870. Pop. 10,000.

St Columb Major, a Cornish town, on the Trent, 14 miles NNE. of Truro. Pop. 2900.

St Croix (Sent Kroi), an American river, called also the Passamaquoddy and the Schoodic, which, flowing out of Grand Lake, on the E. border of Maine, runs SE. 75 miles to Passamaquoddy Bay, along the U.S. boundary. See Santa Cruz.

St Cyr (San^{g} Seer), a French village, dep. Seine-et-Oise, 2 miles W. of Versailles. The institution for poor girls of good birth, founded by Louis XIV., at the suggestion of Madame de Maintenon, who died and was buried here, was suppressed at the Revolution; and in 1806 the buildings were converted by Napoleon into a great military school. Pop. 5000.

St Davids, a 'city' of Pembrokeshire, South Wales, in the westernmost corner of the principality, on the rivulet Alan, within 1½ mile of St Brides Bay and 16 miles WNW. of Haverfordwest station. The ancient Menevia, it is now a mere village; but in the middle ages its cathedral, with the shrine of its founder, St David, the patron saint of Wales, attracted many pilgrims, among them the Conqueror, Henry II., and Edward I. and Queen Eleanor. Rebuilt between 1180 and 1522, that cathedral still is mainly Transition Norman in character, a cruciform pile, measuring 298 feet by 120 across the transepts, with a central tower 116 feet high. Special features are the reddish-hued stone, the richly ornamented nave with rich oak roof, the rood screen (c. 1338), the base of St David's shrine, the tomb of Edmund Tudor, Henry VII.'s father, and the eastern triplet. The west front was rebuilt by Nash in 1793; and the whole was restored by Scott in 1862–78. North of the cathedral is the ruined college of St Mary (1377), with a slender tower 70 feet high; and across the Alan are the stately remains of Bishop Gower's palace (1342), 'altogether unsurpassed by any existing edifice of the kind.' A restored cross, the shattered Close wall, and the imposing Tower Gate deserve notice, and also St Davids Head, rising 100 feet above the sea. Pop. of parish, 1600. See works by Browne Willis (1717), Manby (1801), Bishop Jones and E. A. Freeman (1856), Sir G. G. Scott (1869), and Rev. W. L. Bevan (1888).

St Denis (San^{g} De-nee'), a town in the French dep. of Seine, 4 miles N. of Paris, within the line of forts forming the outer defences of the city. It manufactures calicoes, flour, chemicals, machinery, white-lead, &c., and has a notable fair. The chapel raised above the tomb of St Denis, the patron saint of France, was replaced in the 7th century by an abbey, built by Dagobert I., who was buried in its church, which thereafter became the mausoleum of the kings of France. The existing abbey church was begun in 1137, and skilfully restored by Viollet-le-Duc from 1848 onwards, though it suffered again in the German bombardment of 1871. The most magnificent of the royal tombs are those of Louis XII. and his queen, Anne of Brittany, of Francis I. and Claude, and of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici. During the Revolution, in 1793, the royal tombs were sacrilegiously rifled and demolished. Napoleon converted the abbey into a school for the daughters of officers of the legion of honour. Pop. (1872) 31,850; (1901) 58,871; (1911) 71,759.

St Denis, the capital of Réunion (q.v.).

St-Dié (San^{g}-Dee-ay'), a French town, dep. Vosges, stands on the Meurthe, 50 miles by rail SE. of Nancy. It has a Romanesque-Gothic cathedral, seminary, and museum, and manufactures cotton, hosiery, paper, machinery, and iron goods. Pop. 20,000.

St Dizier (San^{g} Deezeeay'), a French town (dep. Haute-Marne), 38 miles by rail SE. of Châlons, is on the Marne, which is navigable hence. It has iron forges and foundries, boat-building yards, and cotton-factories. Pop. 15,000.

St Domingo. See HAYTI, SAN DOMINGO.

Sainte Anne, the name of two rivers in Quebec Province, tributaries of the St Lawrence, of which one has celebrated falls near its mouth, 22 miles below Quebec, where stands the village of Ste Anne de Beaupré, a celebrated place of pilgrimage for healing.

Sainte Croix. See SANTA CRUZ.

St Elias, MOUNT, a great volcanic mountain on the Alaskan side of the Canadian frontier, 18,020 feet high. It stands in a wild, inaccessible region, and is clothed almost from base to summit with eternal snow. There are huge glaciers and impassable precipices and yawning chasms; but in 1886 a party reached a height of 7200 feet on the mount. Long reckoned the highest mountain in North America, it is exceeded by Mount McKinley in Alaska (20,464 feet), and perhaps by Mount Logan, inside the Canadian line.

Ste Marie. See MADAGASCAR.

Sainte Marie-Aux-Mines. See MARKIRCH.

Saintes (San^{g}t), an old town of France, dep. Charente-Inférieure, on the Charente's left bank, 28 miles by rail SE. of Rochefort, manufactures iron and copper goods, machinery and leather. Mediolanum was the capital of the Santones, whence the name. Its interesting Roman remains include a triumphal arch and the ruins of an amphitheatre. It was a bishop's seat down to 1790; the cathedral still stands. Palissy lived at Saintes for fifty years. The old province was called Saintonge. Pop. 13,000.

St Étienne (San^{g}t Ay-te-enn'), one of the most important industrial towns in France, stands (dep. Loire) on a tributary of the Loire, 36 miles by rail SW. of Lyons and 312 SSE. of Paris. Built in the second largest coalfield of France, it looks thoroughly grimy. The industries are in iron and steel and in ribbons, and have all steadily increased. Its hardware workshops turn out steel and iron plates, gun-armour, iron masts, large castings for machinery, firearms, locks, cutlery, files, nails, tools, ribbons, hats, pottery, &c. The government small-arms factory (1764) has since the Revolution supplied nearly all the muskets and rifles and revolvers for the army. Some 40,000 persons, mostly hand-workers in their own homes, are engaged in the town and its vicinity in making ribbons, laces, fringes, &c. Some of the ribbon-looms are (since 1893) driven by electricity. Pop. (1800) 16,000; (1851) 53,741; (1876) 126,019; (1911) 148,656. The coal-mines began to be worked in the 14th century, but only on an extensive scale in the end of the 18th. The town was twice captured by the Huguenots, in 1563 and 1570. The first railways in France were built from St Étienne (1828–31).

St Eustatius, a Dutch West Indian island, 10 miles NW. of St Kitts. Area, 8 sq. m.; pop. 1300.

Saintfield, a Down market-town, 11 miles SE. of Belfast. Pop. 530.

St Fillans, a Perthshire village, on the Earn, 13 miles W. by N. of Crieff.

St Flour (San^{g} Floor), a town in the French dep. of Cantal, on a steep basaltic plateau (3000 feet) 50 miles S. of Clermont-Ferrand, has a Gothic cathedral (1375–1466) and manufactures pottery, cloth, &c. Pop. 5000.

St Gall, a Swiss canton, with the Lake of Constance on the N. It is for the most part mountainous, rising to 10,660 feet in Ringelspitz, and to 8216 in Säntis. The Rhine flows along the eastern border. Area, 779 sq. m.; pop. (1910) 301,141, mainly Roman Catholic and German-speaking.—ST GALL, the capital, stands on the Steinach, 2196 feet above sea-level (the highest town in Europe), 53 miles by rail E. of Zurich, and 9 from Rorschach on the Lake of Constance. The buildings of its famous Benedictine monastery are now used as government offices and schools, and for housing the monastic library, founded in 830, of 41,700 volumes and 1800 MSS. Other buildings are the old abbey church, made a cathedral in 1846; the Protestant church of St Lawrence; the town library, founded in 1536, and containing 80,000 volumes and 500 MSS.; and the museum. The city carries on a large trade in embroidered textiles (cotton, muslin, &c.), and in agricultural products. Pop. about 38,000. The original nucleus of the place was the cell of St Gall (c. 550–645), an Irish follower of St Columban, who settled here in 614. Around this soon grew up a Benedictine monastery, made by Charles Martel an abbey, which gradually became a masterpiece of mediæval architecture and a home of the arts. At the French Revolution the abbey was secularised (1798), and its revenues sequestrated in 1805.

St-Germain-en-Laye (San^g-Zherman^g-on^g-Lay), a town of France, dep. Seine-et-Oise, stands on an eminence above the Seine, with a royal forest (10,000 acres) behind it, 13 miles W. of Paris. Above the river runs the famous terrace (2625 yards long by 115 feet wide), made in 1672. The historic associations cluster round the old royal château which, until Louis XIV. removed the court to Versailles, was the favourite residence of the kings of France. Here were born Henry II., Charles IX., Louis XIII., and Louis XIV.; here died Louis XIII.; and here James II. of England lived from 1689 to his death in 1701. Turned into barracks, then into a military prison, it was made by Napoleon III. a museum of Gallo-Roman antiquities. Pop. 15,000.—St Germain-des-Prés, named like the other from St Germanus, was a famous Benedictine monastery; its church (1001–1163) is the oldest in Paris.

St Germans, formerly the seat of the ancient diocese of Cornwall, now a small village on a branch of the river Lynher, 9½ miles W. by N. of Plymouth. Its fine parish church has an excellent Norman west front. Pop. of parish, 2000.

St Gervais-les-Bains (San^g-Zhervay-leh-Ban^g), a watering-place in the French dep. of Haute-Savoie, 42 miles SE. of Geneva, was overwhelmed by an ice and water avalanche in 1892.

St Gilles (San^g Zheel), a town of France, dep. Gard, 12 miles SSE. of Nîmes. The west front of its abbey church (1116) is a masterpiece of Romanesque. Pope Clement IV. was born here. Pop. 5000.

St Goar (Sankt Go-âhr'), a village on the Rhine, 14 miles SE. of Coblenz by rail; pop. 1500. On the other side of the Rhine is St Goarshausen.

St Gothard (Got'tard; Ger. Gotthard), an Alpine mountain-knot, 9850 feet high, in the Swiss cantons of Uri, Grisons, Ticino, and Valais. It is the source of the Rhine, Rhone, Ticino, and Reuss, thus sending the water from its melted snows to the German Ocean, the Mediterranean, and the Adriatic. On its shoulder it bears the celebrated Alpine pass (6936 feet) from the Lake of Lucerne in Switzerland to the Lago Maggiore in Italy. In 1820–24 the road was widened to 18 feet and smoothed for carriages. Near the summit of the pass stand two hotels and a hospice, the latter for poor wayfarers, of whom some 12,000 used to travel this way every year. Since 1882, however, a railway has climbed up the lower slopes of the St Gothard, and then burrowed through it in a tunnel (1872–80), which extends from Göschenen (at a height of 3639 feet) in Uri to Airolo (3757 feet) in Ticino, measures 9¼ miles in length, is 26 feet wide and 21 high, and cost £2,270,000.

St Helena (generally called St Helēna, not St Helĕna), a lonely island in the Atlantic, 1200 miles from the west coast of Africa, 1695 from Capetown, and 4477 from Southampton, measures 10 miles by 8, and has an area of 47 sq. m. It is part of an old volcano, and reaches 2823 feet in High Hill. Its shores face the ocean as perpendicular cliffs 600 to 2000 feet high. New Zealand flax has been introduced. Pop. 3500. Till the cutting of the Suez Canal St Helena was a port of call for vessels bound to and from India by the Cape, and the inhabitants did a large trade in provisioning these vessels. In 1890–1906 the British government withdrew the garrison; though, on the other hand, Jamestown, the capital (pop. 2500), on the north-west coast, has been made a second-class imperial coaling station, and carefully fortified. St Helena was discovered by the Portuguese in 1502, and taken possession of by the British East India Company in 1651. It has a governor and an executive council of five. The island was Napoleon Bonaparte's prison from 1815 to his death in 1821. His home was the farmhouse of Longwood, 3 miles inland from Jamestown; and near there he was first buried. There is an Anglican bishop of St Helena. See works by Brooke (1808–24), Melliss (1875), and Jackson (1903).

St Helens, (1) a town of Lancashire, on the Sankey brook, flowing to the Mersey, 12 miles ENE. of Liverpool and 21 W. by S. of Manchester. Thanks to its railway and canal facilities, and to the immediate neighbourhood of coal, it has grown within recent years from quite a small village to an important industrial centre, and now is the great seat of the manufacture of crown, plate, and sheet glass, and also possesses extensive alkali, copper-smelting, and iron works. It became a municipal borough in 1868; a parliamentary borough, returning one member, in 1885; and a county borough in 1888. The town-hall, with library, was opened in 1876. Pop. (1851) 14,866; (1871) 45,134; (1911) 96,551.—(2) A small town in the Isle of Wight, 4 miles SE. of Ryde; pop. 5000.

St Helier (Fr. San^{g}t Eleeay), the capital of Jersey, is situated on the south shore of the island, and the east side of St Aubin Bay. It is defended by Elizabeth Castle (1551–86), on a rocky island off the shore, approached by a causeway at low-water; and by Fort Regent, on the south-east side of the town, built in 1806–15. Victoria College dates from 1852, the public library from 1736. The harbour has outer and inner basins. Pop. 30,000.

St Henri, a SW. suburb of Montreal.

St Hubert, a town of Belgium, 17 miles W. of Bastogne, with an ancient abbey. St Hubert was converted in the forest close by. Pop. 4000.

St Hyacinthe, a city of Quebec, 35 miles ENE. of Montreal, with manufactures, a Catholic college, and monasteries; pop. 10,000.

St Ives, (1) a fishing-town of Cornwall, beautifully situated on the west shore of St Ives Bay, 8 miles NNE. of Penzance. It has a branch-line (1865); a harbour, with a pier by Smeaton (1770) and a breakwater (1864); a 15th-century granite church, with an ancient cross; and a town-hall (1832); whilst on a hill, 545 feet high, is a pyramid (1782). St Ives is the chief seat of the pilchard-fishery, and from its mild climate and good bathing is a favourite resort. It is said to take name from St Ia, an Irish princess, martyred here in 450 A.D. Incorporated by Charles I. in 1639, it returned two members till 1832, and then one till 1885. Population, about 7200. See works by Lach-Szyrma (1878) and J. H. Matthews (1892).—(2) A picturesque old monastic town of Huntingdonshire, on the left bank of the Ouse, 5 miles E. of Huntingdon. Almost destroyed by fire (1689), and inundated by the river (1823), it bears a curious likeness to Stratford-on-Avon, and has a 15th-century parish church, a corn exchange (1864), and a six-arch stone bridge of singular beauty, built by the abbots of Ramsey, with an old chapel or lighthouse in the middle. Cromwell lived at Slepe Hall, now built over, in 1631–36, and T. Watts-Dunton was born here. This place is said to be named after Ivo, a Persian bishop, who died here about 590, and it became in 1017 the seat of a Benedictine priory. A large weekly cattle-market was chartered in 1290, and the town was incorporated in 1874. Pop. 3000.

St-Jean-D'Angély (San^g-Zhon^g-D'On^{g}zhaylee'), a small town of France, dep. of Charente-Inférieure, 15 miles NNE. of Saintes. Pop. 6000.

St Jean de Luz (San^g-Zhong-deh-Lüz), a French watering-place (once a famous port) of dep. Basses Pyrénées, at the mouth of the Nivelle, 7 miles from the Spanish frontier; pop. 3000.

St Jérôme, a river-port of Quebec, on the North River, 33 miles NW. of Montreal; pop. 3500.

St John, the largest river of New Brunswick, rises in Maine, flows 450 miles NE. and SE. (the last 225 within British territory), and falls into the Bay of Fundy by an estuary 5 miles wide. Part of its course separates Maine from Canada.

St John, commercial capital and largest city of New Brunswick, stands on the left bank of the estuary of the St John, 277 miles by rail NW. of Halifax and 481 from Montreal. The harbour is good, and accessible to the largest vessels at all seasons. Shipbuilding and the timber-trade are the chief industries, together with fishing and the West India trade; the manufactures include engines and locomotives, machinery and farming implements, nails, axes, leather, boots and shoes, paper, cotton and woollen goods, clothing, furniture, carriages, soap, &c. On June 21, 1877, a fire destroyed the greater part of the town; but a new St John speedily arose, with wide, clean streets, and handsome buildings—custom-house, post-office, city building, lunatic asylum, hospital, R.C. cathedral, and public library. St John is a terminus of the Canadian Pacific, Inter-colonial, and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways. Pop. 42,500.

St John. See ANTIGUA.

St John's, (1) the capital of Newfoundland, stands on the extreme east coast of the island, on Avalon Peninsula, 1076 miles ENE. of Montreal and 1730 W. by S. of Cork in Ireland. It is thus the nearest port in America to Europe; and it possesses a small but excellent harbour, which is well fortified. Railways run to Harbour Grace, Placentia, and across the island. The city has a number of oil-refineries (fish and seal), and also tanneries, shoe-factories, cabinet-works, &c. It was largely destroyed by fire in July 1892. Pop. 31,500.—(2) Chief town of St John county, Quebec, on the left bank of the river Richelieu, opposite the town of Iberville, and 27 miles by rail SE. of Montreal. It contains a lunatic asylum, barracks, potteries, foundries, sawmills, &c. Pop. 6000.—(3) St John's, or San Juan, capital of Porto Rico, stands on a small island connected by bridges with a peninsula on the north coast; population, 50,000.

St Johnstoun. See PERTH.

St Joseph, a city of Missouri, capital of Buchanan county, on the Missouri River's left bank, 110 miles (by rail 68) above Kansas City. Eight lines of railway centre here, and the river is crossed by an iron railway and foot bridge (1873–1906) of five spans, one a pivot-draw span of 365 feet. St Joseph has large pork-packing establishments and manufactures of stoves, guns, carriages, clothing, furniture, &c. Laid out in 1843, and incorporated as a city in 1851, it was much of it destroyed by fire on 25th September 1893. Pop. 77,400.

St Just (Joost), a Cornish town, 7 miles W. of Penzance, with tin and copper mines. Borlase was a native. Pop. 5800.

St Keyne, a Cornish parish, 2 miles S. of Liskeard, with a well that gives the mastery to the bridegroom or bride who first drinks of it after their marriage. See Southey's poem.

St Kilda, a lonely island in the Atlantic, belonging to Harris in Inverness-shire, and 40 miles W. of North Uist. With an extreme length and breadth of 3¾ and 1¼ miles, it is only 1·9 sq. m. in area; has lofty precipitous cliffs almost everywhere, except at the south-eastern landing-place; and attains a maximum altitude of 1220 feet. The climate is mild; and the soil is black loam, with very fine pasture, but only some 40 arable acres. The live-stock includes nearly a thousand sheep (which graze also on four neighbouring islets), and about forty Highland cattle; but a principal source of wealth is the sea-birds—fulmar petrels, solan geese, puffins, &c.—which supply feathers, oil, and meat. Its native name is Hirta (Gael. h-Iar-tir, 'the western land'); and the name St Kilda is probably of Columban origin. Events in its 'history' have been the reduction of the population by smallpox to four adults and twenty-six children (1724); the imprisonment of Lady Grange here by her husband (1734–42); the emigration of thirty-six islanders to Australia (1856); the drowning of six (1864); and the establishment of a regular school (1884). Pop. (1851, the maximum) 110; (1911) 80. See works by Dean Munro of the Isles (1585), Martin (1698–1703), Kenneth Macaulay (1764), L. MacLean (1838), J. Sands (1877), G. Seton (1878), and R. Connell (1887).

St Kilda, a coast suburb of Melbourne (q.v.), on the east side of Hobson's Bay.

St Kitts. See ST CHRISTOPHER.

St Lawrence, a great river of North America, which, issuing from Lake Ontario, flows north-east 750 miles—part of the way forming the boundary between Canada and the United States—and falls into the Gulf of St Lawrence by a broad estuary. But in its widest acceptation the name includes the whole system of the Great Lakes and their connecting streams, with a total length from source to mouth of 2200 miles, and a drainage basin of 300,000 sq. m. The area of water-surface in the five lakes alone is 94,650 sq. m., and the system constitutes by far the largest body of fresh water in the world. This mighty artery of North-east America rises, under the name of the St Louis, on the spacious plateau which sends forth also the Mississippi towards the Gulf of Mexico, and the Red River of the North towards Hudson Bay. Lake Superior (602 feet above sea-level), the next link in the chain, finds its way to Lake Huron through St Mary's River, whose rapids have a fall of 20½ feet. Below Lake Huron, which receives Lake Michigan from the south, St Clair River, Lake St Clair, Detroit River, and Lake Erie maintain pretty nearly the same level (there is a fall of some 8 feet, however, in Detroit River) till the river

Niagara descends 326 feet to Lake Ontario, which is itself still 247 feet above the sea-level. The St Lawrence proper, with a number of lake-like expansions (such as the Lake of the Thousand Isles, of St Francis, St Peter, &c.), presents the character first of a river, and then of an estuary, down to the gulf. Prior to 1858 only vessels drawing not more than 11 feet of water could pass up above Quebec; but since then a channel has been made in the shallow parts of the river, 300 feet wide, and so deepened that practically the largest ocean-steamers can now pass up to Montreal. Between Lake Ontario and Montreal there are several rapids, which, however, may be all avoided by means of canals. Immediately above the island of Montreal the St Lawrence is joined by its principal auxiliary, the Ottawa (800 miles), from the north-west; and a little more than half-way between this confluence and Three Rivers, the highest point of tidal influence, the Richelieu from the south brings in the tribute of Lake Champlain. Other principal tributaries are the St Maurice (400 miles), the Saguenay (100), and the Batiscan (50). Steamers may now by help of the canals convey their cargo from Liverpool to Duluth at the far end of Lake Superior without breaking bulk. The width of the St Lawrence varies from less than 1 to 4 miles; the estuary at its mouth is above 100 miles across. During winter the river is frozen over and navigation closed.

The GULF OF ST LAWRENCE, an inlet of the North Atlantic, washes Newfoundland, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. It has three communications with the ocean—the Strait of Belleisle, between Newfoundland and Labrador; the Gut of Canso, between the island of Cape Breton and Nova Scotia; and a far wider passage than either, with the island of St Paul in the middle, between Cape Breton and Newfoundland. It narrows, at the west end of Anticosti, into the estuary of the St Lawrence River. Besides Anticosti, St Paul's, and Prince Edward's, this arm of the sea contains many other islands, rendered dangerous to shipping by the fogs and the uncertain currents. Both Gulf and River are celebrated for their fisheries.

St Leonards-on-Sea (St Len'nards). See HASTINGS.

St Lô, a town of Normandy, dep. Manche, is built on a rocky elevation on the right bank of the Vire, 60 miles by rail SE. of Cherbourg. A St Lô, Bishop of Coutances, built a church here in the 6th century. Noteworthy are the beautiful churches of Sainte-Croix, founded in 805, and Notre Dame (15th c.). Cloth, ribbons, wool, and laces are manufactured. The astronomer Leverrier was born here. Pop. 10,000.

St Louis, fourth city of the United States in size, commercial metropolis of the Mississippi valley, and principal city of the Missouri state, is on the west bank of the Mississippi River, 21 miles S. of the mouth of the Missouri, and by rail 1108 WSW. of New York, 2434 E. of San Francisco, and 696 N. of New Orleans. In 1764, Laclède, a fur-trader, established a trading-post here, which he named in honour of Louis IX. of France; in 1803 it passed from France to the United States. Pop. (1840) 16,469; (1850) 74,439; (1870) 310,864; (1910) 687,029. St Louis is built upon three gently sloping terraces, the summit of the third being 200 feet above and 4 miles W. of the river. Beyond this point for miles the country is almost perfectly level. The city has a river frontage of 19 miles; its greatest width is 7 miles. The streets in the old part of the city are narrow, but all those west of Third Street, three blocks from the river, are broad and straight. Of numerous parks the largest is Forest Park. The principal public buildings are the Four Courts, court-house, city hospital, insane asylum, and women's hospital, the custom-house and post-office, which cost over $5,000,000, the Merchants' Exchange, Exposition Building, the Crow Museum of Fine Arts, the new city hall at Washington Park, and the new city courts and jail. The Mercantile Library Building is a handsome structure, and so too is the Public School Library Building. The Washington and St Louis universities, and the Christian Brothers and Concordia colleges are advanced educational institutions. Eighteen railroads enter the Union Depôt (1874–92) of St Louis. The Mississippi at St Louis is spanned by two bridges—the Eads (1874, cost $6,536,730) of three spans, the central being 520 feet, and the two side spans 502 feet each; and the Merchants' Railway Bridge (1890) of steel, 2420 feet long, including approaches. Besides a vast trade in grain and cotton, packed meats, live-stock, timber, wool, furs, St Louis has manufactures of tobacco, beer, boots and shoes, hardware, stoves, cars, biscuits ('crackers'), &c. See Billon, Annals of St Louis in its Early Days (1887).

St Louis (San^{g} Looee'), capital of the French colony of Senegal in West Africa, on a small low island near the mouth of the Senegal River. Bridges connect it with N'dar Toute, a watering-place, on the right bank, and with Bouetville on the left bank. The river is blocked by a bar; and ocean steamers land goods and passengers at Dakar, on Cape Verde, 100 miles SW., and thence they are conveyed by rail to Bouetville. The place has a large trade in gums and earthnuts. There are a cathedral, governor's palace, &c. Pop. 22,000. See also MAURITIUS.

St Lucia, the largest of the Windward Islands, in the West Indies, 42 miles long and 15 to 20 wide, with an area of 245 sq. m. Population, 50,000, of whom 2000 are whites. The exports include sugar, cocoa, logwood, &c. Much of the island is high and rocky land, covered with forest, and it contains deposits of sulphur. The island, discovered in 1502, was colonised by the French in 1563; and before 1803, when it definitively became English, it six times changed hands between France and England. The capital is Castries (pop. 8500).

St Lucia Bay, a lagoon at the mouth of the Umfulosi River in Zululand. Cape St Lucia is a promontory to the S. of the channel.

St Malo (San^{g} Ma-lō'), a seaport of Brittany, dep. Ille-et-Vilaine, on the Rance estuary, 51 miles NNW. of Rennes. The old town clusters all over a rocky islet that is surrounded with walls and connected with the mainland by a narrow causeway. Forts and batteries crown several rocks lying off the town, and the defences are completed by an old castle. The harbour is safe, but difficult of approach; the tides sometimes rise 50 feet, and storms dash over the top of the battlements. About the end of the 17th century the people of this town reaped large fortunes by privateering in the English Channel, and the port was the headquarters of the French East India Company. St Malo exports potatoes, buck-wheat, barley, butter, eggs, and fruit, and imports coal, timber, pitch, and iron. There are a quondam cathedral and a museum. St Malo was the birthplace of Chateaubriand, Maupertuis, Lamennais, Lamettrie, and the sailors Duguay-Trouin, Cartier, and Labourdonnais. St Servan (q.v.) is across a small stream, Dinard (q.v.) across the Rance estuary. Pop. 10,000.

St Margaret's Hope. See FORTH, ROSYTH.

St Martin, one of the Lesser Antilles, West Indies, divided since 1648 between France and Holland, exports salt, sugar, cotton, tobacco, maize, &c.; area, 37 sq. m.; pop. 7000.

St Martin's. See SCILLY ISLANDS.

St Mary's. See SCILLY ISLANDS.

St Mary's Loch. See YARROW.

St Mary's River, the strait between Lakes Huron and Superior, with rapids falling 20½ feet.

St Mawes, a village of Cornwall, on an offshoot of Falmouth Harbour, 3 miles E. of Falmouth. From 1562 to 1832 it returned two members.

St Michael's, or SÃO MIGUEL, the largest and most important of the Azores (q.v.).

St Michael's Mount, a conical and isolated granite rock in Mount's Bay, Cornwall, 3 miles E. of Penzance. It communicates with the shore by a causeway 560 yards long, which, however, is covered with water eight hours out of the twelve, and sometimes is impassable for two or three days together. The Mount is 195 feet high, is 5 furlongs in circumference, and is crowned by an old and picturesque castle—now used as a manorial residence—surmounted by a tower, on one angle of which there is a projecting stone lantern, popularly called 'St Michael's Chair.' At the base of the north or landward side of the Mount is a fishing-village. The 'guarded mount' is said to have received its name from an apparition of St Michael to some hermits; and Edward the Confessor founded upon it a Benedictine priory, which in 1088 was annexed to the abbey of Mont St Michel in Normandy. After the Dissolution it became the residence of five families in turn, until it was sold in 1660 to its present proprietors, the St Aubyns. For a demolition of the notion that the mount within Cornish-speaking times has been converted from a wooded promontory to an island, see Max-Müller's Chips, vol. iii.

St Michel (Mon^g San^g Mee-shell'), MONT, an extraordinary rocky islet of the Norman dep. of Manche, in the Bay of St Michel, 18 miles WSW. of Avranches. It is a solitary cone of granite, a thousand yards in circumference and 242 feet high. It rises sheer out of a level expanse of sand, and is a most striking feature in the landscape. Till 1880–81 it was only accessible by crossing the sands at low-water, there being a firm track across them, with quicksands to right and left; but a good road was then formed along a causeway a mile in length. A Druid stronghold once, the islet, as the scene of an apparition of St Michael in 708, became the seat of a great Benedictine monastery, which, 'half church of God, half fortress,' has memories of Henry I., II., and V. of England, resisting the last successfully in two sieges. The Revolution transformed this celebrated place of pilgrimage into a prison, and such it remained until 1863; in 1874 it was declared a 'monument historique,' and large sums have been spent on its restoration by Viollet-le-Duc and his successor. The buildings include the church (c. 1140–1521), with Norman nave and Flamboyant choir; the exquisite cloisters (1228); the Halle des Chevaliers, where Louis XI. in 1469 founded the order of St Michael; and 'La Merveille,' the monastery proper, so called from its huge north wall of the 13th century, 246 feet long and 108 high. Beneath is a village (pop. 200).

St Monans, a fishing-village of Fife, 2¾ miles WSW. of Anstruther, with an antique church. Pop. 1900.

St Moritz, a favourite watering-place in the upper Engadine (q.v.), with chalybeate, sulphurous and other mineral waters, and a pop. of 1600.

St Nazaire (San^g Na-zair'), a seaport of France, dep. Loire-Inférieure, is situated on the north side of the estuary of the Loire, 40 miles by rail W. by N. of Nantes. Between 1831 and 1887 £1,450,000 was spent on harbour improvements, extensive docks (82 acres) having been built for large vessels unable to get up the Loire to Nantes (q.v.). Pop. 38,300.

St Neots, a market-town of Hunts, on the Ouse, 8 miles SSW. of Huntingdon. It takes name from Alfred the Great's eldest brother, whose relics were translated from the Cornish parish of St Neot (now Liskeard) to a Benedictine monastery founded at Eynesbury, close by, in 974; and it has a fine parish church, with a tower 156 feet high, a corn exchange (1863), and manufactures of iron, paper, &c. Pop. (urban district) 4200. See Gorham's History of Eynesbury and St Neots (2 vols. 1824).

St Nicolas, a town of Belgium, 12 miles by rail W. by S. of Antwerp. It has a large flax-market, and manufactures cotton and woollen stuffs, lace, needles, bricks, and pottery. Pop. 35,000.

St Ninians, a village 1 mile S. of Stirling, manufacturing nails, screw-bolts, woollens, and leather.

St Omer (San^{g}t Omayr'), a fortified town of France, dep. Pas-de-Calais, stands in a marshy site, on the Aa, 26 miles SE. of Calais by rail. It has a Gothic cathedral (13th–15th century), an arsenal, museum, and library. A college for the education of English and Irish Catholics was opened at St Omer in 1592. It was closed during the Revolution, but still exists as a seminary. Alban Butler was a president, and O'Connell a student. The manufactures include tobacco-pipes, tulle, cambric, cloth, and muslin. Pop. 20,000.

Saintonge (San^{g}ton^{g}zh), a former French maritime province (capital, Saintes), now forming mainly the dep. of Charente-Inférieure.

St Paul, the capital of the state of Minnesota, on the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Minnesota River. It is the outgrowth of a hamlet of voyageurs, chiefly Canadian, employed in the fur trade, and in selling whisky to the soldiers at Fort Snelling. The first log-huts were erected here in 1840, and in 1841 a small Catholic log-chapel dedicated to St Paul. In 1849 the city was made the capital of Minnesota territory. Upon the lower plateau of limestone rock are the capitol, post-office, court-house, and large stores; the best private residences are on the upper plateau, overlooking the Mississippi. The Summit Avenue is noted for its width and the costliness of the houses. There are several colleges, not under the control of the city or state: Macalester College (1853), Hamline Methodist University (1854), and St Thomas Roman Catholic College. The water-works furnish a daily supply of eight million gallons. All parts of the city are reached by electric street-railways. There are several important libraries. St Paul is the centre of the wholesale grocery and dry-goods business in Minnesota. Pop. (1860) 10,701; (1880) 41,473; (1900) 163,065; (1910) 214,744.

St Paul, a volcanic islet, 2 miles long and 860 feet high, in the Indian Ocean, midway between Africa and Australia, in 38° 42′ S. lat. and 77° 32′ E. long. It is comparatively bare, in contrast to the densely vegetated island of New Amsterdam, 50 miles to the north, like which it was annexed by France in 1892.—St Paul's Rocks, a group of small islets 1° N. of the equator and 540 miles from the South American Atlantic coast.

St Paul de Loanda. See LOANDA.

St Peter Port, the town of Guernsey (q.v.).

St Petersburg, capital of the Russian empire, stands at the head of the Gulf of Finland, and at the mouth of the Neva, in 59° 56′ N. lat. and 39° 19′ E. long. The flat and low marshy ground upon which the city is built only recently emerged from the sea; the mighty Neva, which flows 36 miles from Lake Ladoga, subdivides into many branches, thus forming some 100 islands. When a strong wind blows from the sea its level rises, and the poorer streets are flooded; when the overflow exceeds 10 feet (as in 1891) nearly the whole city is inundated. The country is so marshy and barren that the government of St Petersburg (area, 20,760 sq. m.; pop., without the capital, 1,000,000) has only 50 inhabitants per sq. m. In 1702 Peter the Great captured the Swedish forts on the Neva, laid the foundations of his capital on one of the islands of the delta, and dreamed to make of it a new Amsterdam. The Neva, connected by canals with the upper Volga, became the outlet of the immense basin of the chief river of Russia and its numberless tributaries; and assisted by four main lines of railway St Petersburg has almost from the first been the chief port of Russia for the export of raw produce and the import of manufactured goods. Foreign trade and the centralisation of government have made St Petersburg a populous city with about two million inhabitants and covering 42 sq. m., on the banks of the Neva and the islands formed by its branches. The Great Neva (400 to 700 yards wide within the city) is a beautiful river of deep and pure water. But the channel across the bar at its mouth is narrow and sinuous, so that Cronstadt, on an island 16 miles W. of St Petersburg, remains both the fortress and the port of the capital; though since 1885 a ship-canal, 22 feet deep, admits ships to St Petersburg, and two-thirds of the foreign vessels unload within the city. The main body of the city stands on the mainland, on the left bank of the Neva; and a beautiful granite quay, with a long series of palaces and mansions, stretches for 2½ miles. Only three permanent bridges cross the Neva; a bridge of boats is removed in autumn and spring. The island Vasilievsky, between the Great and Little Nevas, contains the Stock Exchange, the Academy of Sciences, the University, the Philological Institute, the Academy of Arts, and various schools and colleges. On the Peterburgskiy Island, between the Little Neva and the Great Nevka, stands the old fortress and prison of St Peter and St Paul, facing the Winter Palace, and containing the Mint and the cathedral wherein the members of the imperial family are buried, also the arsenal. Numerous islands, separated from each other by the small branches into which both Nevkas subdivide, and connected together by a great number of wooden bridges, are covered with beautiful parks and summer-houses. The main part of St Petersburg has for its centre the Old Admiralty; its lofty gilded spire and the gilded dome of St Isaac's Cathedral are among the first sights caught on approaching St Petersburg by sea. Three streets radiate from it, the first of them the famous Nevskiy Prospect. The street architecture, with its huge brick houses covered with stucco and mostly painted gray, is rigid and military in aspect. A spacious square, planted with trees, encloses the Old Admiralty on three sides. To the east of it rise the magnificent mass of the Winter Palace, the Hermitage Gallery of Art, and the semicircular buildings of the general staff. In the Petrovskiy Square is the well-known statue of Peter I. on an immense block of Finland granite. The richly decorated cathedral of St Isaac of Dalmatia, erected by Nicholas I., is an almost cubic building (330 feet long, 290 broad, and 310 high), surmounted by one large and lofty and four small gilded domes. In Nevskiy Prospect are the Kazan cathedral, the public library, the square of Catharine II., and the Anitchkoff Palace.

The climate is less severe than might be expected, but it is unhealthy and very changeable. The average temperatures are 15·4° F. in January, 64° in July, and 38·6° for the year; the Neva is frozen for an average of 147 days in the year. A short but hot summer is followed by a damp autumn and very changeable winter, severe frosts being followed by rainy days in the midst of winter, and returning in April and May after the first warm days of the spring. The population rapidly increased during the 19th century, and attained, with the suburbs, 1,900,000 in 1910, as against 918,000 in 1881. But it decreases very much during the summer, because the crowds of peasants who come to work in the factories in winter, return to their villages in summer. The sanitary arrangements being very imperfect, typhoid fever and European cholera are endemic. The mortality, 31 to 39 per thousand before 1885, is now 24. 1½ per cent. are Finnish citizens, 4 per cent. Germans (mostly from the Baltic provinces), and 2 per cent. Poles.

The total production of its factories (cottons, various textiles, metals, leather, sugar, guns, porcelain goods, &c.) is nearly £29,000,000. Yearly 20,000 boats and rafts, laden with corn, hemp, flax, linseed, leather, fuel-wood, and building materials (3,000,000 tons), reach St Petersburg by the Neva; and 1,300,000 tons of goods, including 500,000 tons of corn, come in by rail, chiefly from the upper Volga. The export of corn from St Petersburg alone is one-fifth of the total export from Russia; besides hemp, flax, linseed, leather, crude petroleum, &c., the total value of the exports being from £8,000,000 to £10,000,000; the imports, chiefly of coal, machinery, groceries, and manufactured goods, reach about the same value. The port is visited yearly by about 1800 ships.

The number and variety of scientific, literary, educational, artistic, and technical institutions concentrated in the capital, render life at St Petersburg attractive. The St Petersburg University, and the numerous academies, medical, technological, engineering, naval, military, &c., as well as the Ladies' University, number thousands of students, both male and female. The Academy of Sciences and the Academy of Arts are well known; there is an excellent conservatoire of music. The public libraries are numerous. Besides the Imperial Public Library (2,000,000 volumes and 40,000 MSS.), there are the libraries of the Academy of Sciences, the University, the Council of State, as well as those of the scientific societies. There are besides rich museums of art in the Hermitage (Flemish, Russian, and early Italian schools well represented, and priceless collections of Greek and Scythian antiquities), in the Academy of Arts; and there are important museums. The Russian publishing trade is concentrated at St Petersburg.

St Pierre was the largest town, though not the capital, of Martinique (q.v.), in the West Indies, with a good harbour, cathedral, college, and botanical garden. It was the birthplace of Josephine, consort of Napoleon I. It was utterly destroyed on 8th May 1902 by an eruption of Mont Pelée, when its 30,000 inhabitants perished in 'a whirlwind of fire,' followed by lava, ashes, and dense sulphurous fumes.

St Pierre. See Réunion, and Miquelon.

St Pol de Léon (San^g Pol deh Lay-on$^{g\prime}$), a decayed town in the Breton dep. of Finistère, near the English Channel, 13 miles NNW. of Morlaix. It has a 13th-century cathedral, and a church with a beautiful spire 263 feet high. Pop. 8000.

St Quentin (San^g Kon^{g}tan^g), a town in the French dep. of Aisne, on the Somme, 95 miles NE. of Paris and 33 S. of Cambrai. The church of St Quentin is a fine Gothic structure, dating from the 12th to the 15th century. The town-hall (15th–16th c.) is also a fine specimen of Gothic. The town is a centre of cotton industries which give employment to 130,000 hands in the making of calicoes, tulle, cretonnes, jaconets, muslin, merino, cambric, and gauze. Embroidery is largely prepared, and machinery, hats, paper, sugar, soap, and beer are manufactured. The population is about 55,600. The Spaniards and an English contingent inflicted a crushing defeat upon the French in 1557. Shortly afterwards the town, after a brilliant defence by Coligny, capitulated to the Spanish army. In 1871 the Germans routed the army of Faidherbe here.

St Radigunds Abbey, Kent, a ruin (1191) 3 miles W. of Dover.

St Raphael, a winter-resort on the French Riviera, 2½ miles SE. of Fréjus by rail. Pop. 5000.

St Ronan's Well. See Innerleithen.

St Servan (San^g Ser-von^g), a seaport and watering-place of France, dep. Ille-et-Vilaine, stands on the east side of the estuary of the Rance, just above St Malo, from which it is separated by a creek a mile wide. It has a floating-dock, and carries on shipbuilding. Close by are the ruins of the cathedral of Aleth (6th to 12th century). St Servan was the birthplace of the order of 'Little Sisters of the Poor.' Pop. 10,000.

St Thomas, a volcanic island of Africa belonging to Portugal, lies in the Gulf of Guinea 170 miles W. of the mouth of the river Gabun. Its southern extremity almost touches the equator. Measuring 32 miles by 21, it has an area of 360 sq. m.; pop. nearly 40,000, including 1000 whites. Although it rises to 6000 feet, it is very unhealthy. Cocoa is grown, under regulations (1910–11) made necessary by contract-labour abuses. The chief town is St Thomas (pop. 3000), on the NE. coast, the seat of a bishop. The island was discovered in 1470, and colonised in 1493 by the Portuguese, to whom it reverted after a Dutch occupation from 1641 to 1844.

St Thomas, one of the Virgin Islands in the West Indies, belongs to Denmark, and lies 36 miles E. of Puerto Rico; area, 33 sq. m.; pop. 11,000 (many Jews). English is the language of the educated classes. The surface is hilly (1555 feet) and the soil poor. The port is Charlotte Amalie or St Thomas (pop. 8000).

St Thomas, a town of Ontario, 9 miles N. of Port Stanley on Lake Erie. Pop. 14,000.

St Trond, a manufacturing town of Belgian Limburg, 12 miles WNW. of Tongres.

St Ubes. See Setubal.

St Valery, two French watering-places on the English Channel, one (Valery-en-Caux) 17 miles WSW. of Dieppe, the other (Valery-sur-Somme) 30 miles NE. of Dieppe, each with about 3500 inhabitants.

St Vincent, one of the British islands in the West Indies, Windward Group, 105 miles W. of Barbadoes; area, 132 sq. m.; pop. 42,000, nearly all negroes or of mixed blood. The island is traversed by a chain of volcanic mountains, which rise in the volcano called the Souffrière (destructive eruptions in 1812 and 1902; see St Pierre) to 3000 feet. Sugar, rum, cocoa, spices, arrowroot, and cotton are products. The chief town is Kingstown (pop. 4200).

St Vincent, Cape, a promontory forming the SW. corner of Portugal. Off here, in 1693, Rooke was defeated by the French; in 1780 Rodney destroyed here several Spanish ships; in 1797 Jervis's great victory of Cape St Vincent resulted in the total defeat of the Spaniards; and in 1833 the fleet of Queen Maria, commanded by Sir Charles Napier, defeated that of Dom Miguel.

Sais (Say-iss or Sah-eess), an ancient Egyptian city, on the Canopic branch of the Nile.

Sakai (Sa-kī), a town of Japan, in the SW. of Honshu, 7 miles S. of Osaka. Pop. 61,000.

Sakhalin. See Saghalien.

Sakkar. See Sukkur.

Sakkara (Sak-kah'ra). See Pyramids.

Sakurashima, an island volcano in Kagoshima Bay, damaged Kagoshima in 1914.

Salamanca, a city of Spain, stands on and between four low hills beside the river Tormes, 110 miles NW. of Madrid. Its university, founded in 1243, was till the close of the 17th c. one of the most celebrated in Europe. In the 16th c. it had from 6000 to 8000 students; now there are only 1200. The university buildings date chiefly from the 15th century, and are Gothic in style. The library, founded in 1254, contains 80,000 vols. and 1000 MSS. The city is still surrounded with walls, pierced by ten gates, and preserves very much of its mediæval appearance. The river is crossed by a bridge of twenty-seven arches, in part of Roman construction. The great square is one of the largest in Spain; it is surrounded by an arcade, and has on one side the municipal buildings. The city possesses two cathedrals; the old cathedral, late Romanesque in style, dating from the 12th century; the new cathedral (1513–1734), a florid Gothic pile. Amongst the remaining noteworthy buildings are the Jesuit College (1614); the Old College, now the governor's palace; the convents of the Dominicans and the Augustinians. In the middle ages Salamanca was famous for its leather-work; at the present day it manufactures a little cloth, linen, leather, and pottery. Population, 30,000. The town was captured by Hannibal in 222 B.C.; and the Moors were expelled in 1055. During the Peninsular war it was taken by the French (1812), and in the vicinity Wellington defeated Marmont, 22d July 1812.—The province has an area of 4800 sq. m. and a pop. of 330,000.

Sal'amis (now Koluri), a mountainous Greek island, forming with Attica the Bay of Eleusis, has a naval arsenal; area, 35 sq. m.; pop. 10,000.

The chief town is the port of Koluri, on the west coast, with some 5000 inhabitants. In ancient times the towns of Old and New Salamis lay, the former on the south, the latter on the north-east coast. Salamis was an independent state till about 620 B.C., when it fell, first to Megara, next to Athens. Its name is ever memorable from the great naval victory of the Greeks over Xerxes' vast Persian fleet, fought (480 B.C.) a few days after the battle of Thermopylæ, in the narrow strait between the east coast of Salamis and the west coast of Attica.

Salangor. See SELANGOR.

Salcombe, a South Devon town, on the W. side of Salcombe Haven, 4 miles S. of Kingsbridge. Its climate is reputed to be the warmest in England. Froude is buried here. Pop. 2000.

Saldanha Bay. See CAPE PROVINCE.

Sale, a town of Cheshire, 5 miles SSW. of Manchester; pop. 15,000.

Salem, a town of S. India, 120 miles by rail SW. of Madras, with cotton manufactures; pop. 59,000.

Salem, (1) a city and port of entry on a peninsula in Massachusetts Bay, 16 miles by rail N. by E. of Boston. It has a good harbour, which formerly carried on a large foreign trade; now only a coast trade in ice and coal remains. The East India Marine Society's collections are now united with those of the Peabody Academy of Science, the Essex Institute, and the Salem Athenæum, the last two housed in Plummer Hall. The manufactures include cottons, jute, leather, shoes, iron castings, lead pipes, &c. Salem was settled in 1626. In the great witchcraft delusion of 1692 nineteen persons were hanged and one pressed to death. Hawthorne and Prescott were born here. Population, about 43,700.—(2) Capital of Salem county, New Jersey, on Salem Creek, 3½ miles from its entrance into the Delaware, and 36 miles by rail SSW. of Camden. It has manufactories of glass, flour, oilcloth, carriages, besides a foundry, planing-mills, and fruit-canneries. Pop. 1250.—(3) Capital of Oregon since 1860, on the east bank of the Willamette River, 52 miles by rail S. by W. of Portland and 720 N. of San Francisco. Here are the state capitol, prison, insane asylum, the Willamette University (Methodist Episcopal, 1851), &c. Pop. 14,000.

Salemi (Salay'mee), a town in the west of Sicily, 39 miles SW. of Palermo; pop. 20,000.

Salerno (anc. Salernum), a city of Italy, on the Gulf of Salerno, 33 miles by rail SE. of Naples. A hill behind the town is crowned by an old Norman castle. The beautiful cathedral of St Matthew was erected by the Normans (1076–84). The city was celebrated for its university (founded in 1150, closed in 1817), and for its school of medicine, long the first in Europe, which decayed in the 14th century. In the neighbourhood are the ruins of Pæstum (q.v.). Originally a Roman colony (194 B.C.), Salerno was made his capital by Robert Guiscard, and sacked by the Emperor Henry VI. Pop. 43,400.

Salette, LA, an Alpine village of France, dep. Isère, 28 miles SSE. of Grenoble. In 1846 the Virgin was alleged to have appeared to two peasant children on a spot where in 1852–61 a pilgrimage church was built at an elevation of 5920 feet. The apparition was discredited by Pope Leo XIII. in 1879. Pop. 500.

Saleyer (Salī'er), a group of islands lying off the south-west extremity of Celebes, in the East Indies (total area, 404 sq. m.; pop. 80,000), whose chiefs pay tribute to Holland. Principal exports, cotton, trepang, cocoa-nuts, tortoiseshell, salt, and tobacco. The people, Malays, are Mohammedans.

Salford, a municipal and county borough (pop. 231,000), virtually part of Manchester (q.v.), from which it is separated by the Irwell.

Sali'na, a town of Kansas, 186 miles W. by S. of Kansas City; pop. 10,000.

Salina Cruz, a port of Mexico, Pacific terminus of the Tehuantepec railway.

Salins (anc. Salinæ), a town of the French dep. of Jura, 22 miles S. by W. of Besançon, has valuable salt-springs; pop. 4000.

Salisbury, or NEW SARUM, is a cathedral city, capital of Wiltshire, a parliamentary and municipal borough, near the confluence of the Avon, Bourne, Wily, and Nadder, 84 miles WSW. of London. Old Sarum (Sorbiodunum), from Roman times a castle and a place of much importance, now consists of a bare conical entrenched hill about a mile N. of the present city. About 1075 Bishop Herman removed the bishopric of the united sees of Ramsbury and Sherborne to Old Sarum. A cathedral (whose foundations have been excavated) was built by his successor, St Osmund, who compiled the Use of Sarum. Burned a few days after consecration, it was rebuilt immediately, and again on a larger scale in the 12th century. Old Sarum returned two members to parliament until the passing of the Reform Bill, although there had for years been no inhabitants. The removal from Old Sarum to New Sarum or Salisbury began in 1220, when the foundations of the new cathedral were laid. The Lady Chapel was consecrated in 1225, and the whole building in 1260. A double cross in plan, it is a perfect example of pure Early English style. The spire (c. 1330) is the highest in England (400 feet); it leans 22 inches towards the south. The cathedral suffered from a disastrous 'restoration' at the hands of James Wyatt (1782–91), when two 15th-century chapels and two porches were destroyed, much painted glass removed, the tombs rearranged, and a lofty isolated campanile pulled down. Much of the damage then done has been repaired in the restoration begun in 1863. The library (c. 1450) contains about 5000 volumes and many valuable MSS. The outside measurements of the cathedral are: length 473 feet, width 111 feet; the height of the nave and choir inside is 81 feet. The cathedral stands apart from any other building in the midst of a beautiful Close of about half a square mile in extent, encircled by a wall, within which stand the Bishop's Palace (an irregular building begun by Bishop Richard Poore, c. 1220), the deanery and canons' houses, and many other picturesque buildings. Other notable buildings are the council-house, where the assizes are held; the county hall; the infirmary; the 'Hall of John Hall' and Audley House, now the church-house of the diocese, two fine examples of 15th-century domestic architecture; the Old George Inn (14th cent.), where Pepys stayed; St Nicholas' Hospital; the market-house; the poultry-cross; and the Blackmore Museum, which contains one of the finest collections of prehistoric antiquities in England. The plan of the city is very regular. Water originally ran through most of the streets, but the streams were covered over after the visitation of the cholera in 1849. The spacious market-place is planted with trees, and contains statues of Lord Herbert of Lea (Sidney Herbert) and Professor Fawcett, who was a native of the city. Here the Duke of Buckingham was beheaded in 1483 when Salisbury was the headquarters of Richard III. The city chiefly depends upon its agricultural trade, the former manufactures of cutlery and woollens being extinct. Salisbury returns one member. Pop. (1851) 11,657; (1881) 14,792; (1911) 21,217. See works by Hatcher, Britton (1814), Price (1753), Dodsworth (1814), and Jones (1879, &c.).—Salisbury Plain, an undulating tract of chalky down, is a military training-ground, with camps and flying-stations. There are many ancient barrows, and in the midst Stonehenge (q.v.).

Salisbury, capital of Southern Rhodesia (q.v.), about 225 miles NE. of Bulawayo, with which, as with Beira, it has railway connection. It has government offices, municipality, churches, banks, schools, &c. White pop. about 3500.

Salisbury, (1) in North Carolina, 44 miles NNE. of Charlotte, has a coloured college and normal school, and the national cemetery with over 12,000 graves. Pop. 7000.—(2) In Maryland, 32 miles ENE. from Chrisfield, has canning factories and manufactures. Pop. 7000.

Sallee, Salé, or Sla, a seaport of Morocco, on the Atlantic, at the mouth of the Bu-Ragreb, on the north side of the river, opposite Rabat (q.v.). It was for centuries notorious as a haunt of pirates, the 'Sallee Rovers.' Pop. 30,000.

Salomon Islands. See Solomon Islands.

Salona, a ruined city of Dalmatia, at the head of a gulf of the Adriatic, 3 miles NE. of Spalato.

Saloni'ca, or Saloniki (Turk. Selanik), a great commercial city of Greece, in Macedonia, at the head of the Gulf of Salonica, 820 miles SSE. of Vienna by rail (1889), viâ Belgrade, Usküb, and Nisch. It climbs up the rocky heights that stretch back from the shore, and is overlooked by a citadel; the white walls are 5 miles in circumference, and the buildings are embowered in trees. Many of the Christian churches were turned into mosques by the Turks. St Sophia, modelled after its namesake at Constantinople, built in Justinian's reign, and a mosque from 1589, is shaped like a Greek cross, and surmounted by a dome covered with mosaics. It was injured in the great fire of September 3–4, 1890, which did £800,000 of damage to the town. St George, dating from Constantine, is circular; its dome too is covered with fine mosaics. St Demetrius (7th century) is decorated internally with slabs of different coloured marble. The Old Mosque was anciently a temple of Venus. Here is the propylæum of the hippodrome in which Theodosius in 390 ordered the massacre of 7000 citizens. One of two fine handsome Roman arches was taken down in 1867; the other still stands, but in a ruinous condition. The commerce is increasing, especially since the opening of railways. Lines run to Constantinople, Belgrade, and Monastir, and the last is to be linked with the Athens-Larissa route. The imports consist chiefly of metal wares, textiles, coffee, petroleum, salt, sugar, rice, and soap; the exports of corn, cotton, opium, wool, tobacco, skins, silk, cocoons, &c. The industries include the manufacture of cotton, flour, soap, bricks, leather, silk, and carpets. Population, 150,000, one-half Jews of Spanish descent. A new harbour was opened in 1901. Salonica is the ancient Thessalonica, to whose Christian community St Paul addressed two epistles. Here Cicero dwelt for a time. Thessalonica was built by Cassander about 315 B.C. on the site of the older Therme, and was called after his wife, sister of Alexander the Great. It soon became the principal harbour of Macedonia. Under the Byzantine emperors it successfully withstood the Goths and the Slavs, but was captured by Moslems from Africa in 904, and by the Normans of south Italy in 1185. From the Venetians the Turks took it in 1430. It was the headquarters of the Young Turk movement (1908). The Greeks took it in 1912, and retained it in spite of Bulgarian rivalry.

Salop. See Shropshire.

Salsette (Portu. pron. Sal-set'tay), an island connected with Bombay by bridge and causeway, is studded with Portuguese ruins, and rich in rice-fields and coconut groves; area, 241 sq. m. Nearly 100 caves and cave-temples in a hill-face at Kánhari, or Keneri, 5 miles W. of the chief town, Thana (q.v.), contain colossal carvings. There are other caves at Montpezir, Kanduti, Amboli, &c. Portuguese early in the 16th century, Salsette was captured by the British in 1774.

Salta, a northern province of Argentina, touching Chili and Bolivia; area, 62,000 sq. m.; pop. 150,000.—Salta, the capital, on the Rio Arias, 535 miles by rail N. by W. of Córdoba, was founded in 1582, and is the seat of an archbishop; pop. 23,000.

Saltaire, a model village of Yorkshire, on the Aire, 3 miles NW. of Bradford, founded and built by Sir Titus Salt, who opened his worsted and alpaca factory here in 1853. The place possesses a church of Byzantine architecture, hospital, school, a park of 14 acres, workmen's club and institute, technical schools (1887), &c. It forms part of Shipley (q.v.) urban district.

Saltash, a picturesque municipal borough and seaport of Cornwall, on the west side of the Tamar estuary, and 4½ miles NW. of Plymouth by a railway that crosses the Tamar by Brunel's iron Royal Albert Viaduct (1857–59), 2240 feet long and 240 high (the roadway 102 feet above high-water mark), constructed at a cost of £230,000. The church of St Nicholas dates from 1225. The town was disfranchised in 1832. Pop. 4100.

Saltburn, a picturesque Yorkshire watering-place, built on lofty cliffs facing the sea, 4 miles SE. of Redcar, dates from the opening of the railway in 1861. Pop. 3300.

Saltcoats, a watering-place of Ayrshire, on the Firth of Clyde, 1 mile ESE. of Ardrossan and 30 miles SW. of Glasgow. It was a seat of salt manufacture from 1686 to 1827. Pop. 8600.

Saltfleet, a Lincolnshire coast-village, 9½ miles ENE. of Louth.

Saltillo (Salteel'yo), capital of the Mexican state of Coahuila, by rail 237 miles SW. of Laredo, in Texas, and 603 N. by W. of Mexico city. Pop. 35,000. Near it is Buena Vista (q.v.).

Salt Lake City, the chief town and ecclesiastical capital of the state of Utah, is on the river Jordan, 11 miles from Great Salt Lake (q.v.), and 4265 feet above the level of the sea. By rail it is 36 miles S. of Ogden, on the Union Pacific Railroad (833 miles from San Francisco and 1031 from Omaha). It was settled by the Mormons in 1847, and incorporated in 1851; has an area of 12 sq. m., with corporate limits embracing 50 sq. m.; and its shaded streets, 137 feet wide, many of them freshened by streams of running water from the neighbouring mountains, are traversed by tram-cars (1872), and lit by gas (1873) and the electric light (1877). The public buildings include the Mormon temple (1853–93; cost over $2,500,000), with walls built of blocks of dressed granite, 20 feet thick at the basement, and tapering to 6 feet thick at the top; the Tabernacle, an immense elliptical building, with a dome-shaped ('dish-cover') roof resting on sandstone pillars, and seated for 9000; the new assembly hall, of rough-hewn granite; the endowment-house, &c. Other religious bodies also are represented, and there are Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, and Methodist churches: St Mark's Cathedral is a handsome building. Other noteworthy edifices are those of the museum, the Mining Institute, St Mary's Hospital, the university of Utah (1850; buildings finished 1887), and the theatres and opera-house. The city is more important as a trading centre than for manufactures. Pop. 93,000. See a work by Burton (1861) and Bancroft's History of Utah (1889).

Saltley, a NE. suburb of Birmingham.

Saltney, a Flintshire village on the Dee, 2 miles SW. of Chester, with docks and ironworks; pop. 6600.

Salto (Sahl'to), capital of a NW. dep. of Uruguay (area, 4863 sq. m.; pop. 60,000), stands near the head of navigation on the Uruguay River, 86 miles by rail N. of Paysandù; pop. 18,000.

Saltram, on the Cattewater, 4 miles ENE. of Plymouth, seat of the Earl of Morley.

Salt Range, a barren mountain-system, 3200 to 5000 feet high, in the Punjab, India, consists of two E. and W. chains enclosing a lofty tableland rich in rock-salt.

Saluzzo (Saloot'zo), an Italian city near the Alps, 42 miles by rail S. by W. of Turin. It has a cathedral (1480), with the tombs of the marquises of Saluzzo, their old castle (now a prison), and the ruined abbey of Staffarda (1131–1737). Silvio Pellico was born here. Pop. 10,000.

Salvador', the smallest but by far the most thickly populated of the Central American Republics, consists of a strip of territory stretching between Honduras and the Pacific. It is 140 miles in length by about 60 in average breadth, and has an area estimated at 7225 sq. m., with a pop. of about 1,200,000. Except for a narrow seaboard of low alluvial plains, Salvador consists of a plateau, some 2000 feet above the sea, furrowed by river valleys and broken by numerous volcanic cones, and bounded on the N. by the Central American Cordillera. Of the volcanoes (4900 to 6900 ft.), many are extinct; earthquakes are frequent (see SAN SALVADOR). The Lempa (140 miles) receives the surplus waters of the Laguna de Cuija, and the San Miguel drains the south-east portion of the republic. The climate is equable, very healthy in the interior, and even along the coast less unwholesome than on the Atlantic side of Central America. The land is well watered, and the soil exceedingly fertile. The principal products are coffee, indigo, and balsam (on the Balsam Coast); also tobacco, sugar, maize, rice, beans, india-rubber, vanilla, and ornamental woods. Gold and silver are mined, and coal and iron worked. The exports (coffee, sugar, indigo, &c.) range in value from 8 to 16 million dollars per annum, the imports from 3 to 7 millions. Of the imports (cotton goods the principal item) 35 per cent. is from great Britain and 25 per cent. from the United States. The population consists mostly of (Aztec) Indians and mixed races; the whites number 60,000. The Indians almost all speak Spanish and profess the Roman Catholic religion. The government is carried on by a president, four ministers, and a congress of forty-two deputies. The revenue, varying from 5 to 13 million dollars, shows a slight excess over the expenditure; the internal debt is returned at $10,000,000, and the external debt is about £917,000. There is an army of 16,000 men and 12,000 militia. Railways connect Acajutla (the chief port) with Santa Ana and Ateos, and Ateos with the capital, San Salvador (q.v.). Salvador, originally called Cuscatlan, was conquered by Alvarado in 1525–26. In 1821 it threw off the Spanish yoke, and from 1823 to 1839 it belonged to the Central American confederacy. Since 1853 it has been an independent republic disturbed by frequent pronunciamientos and wars with its neighbours. See books on Central America by Bates (1879) and Squier (1868), on Salvador by Martin (1911).

Salvatierra, a cotton-making town of Mexico, 197 miles NW. of Mexico city; pop. 12,000.

Salwin, a river of Asia that flows south through the Shan country, then between Siam and British Burma, to the Gulf of Martaban a little below Maulmain. It is navigable for about 80 miles. The valley of the Salwin (also spelt Salwen, Salween, and Salouain) is imperfectly known. It was long uncertain whether the Lukiang of the Chinese (Tibetan Giama Nu-Chu), which has a course of some 700 miles through Tibet, was the Salwin or the Irawadi (q.v.). The latter view has been abandoned.

Salzbrunn (Sahltz'broon), a group of three villages in Prussian Silesia, 40 miles by rail SW. of Breslau. Their eight mineral springs attract nearly 4000 visitors in the season. The alkalo-saline water is largely exported. Pop. 13,000.

Salzburg (Sahltz'boorg), a crown-land of Austria, bounded W. by Bavaria and the Tyrol, S. by Carinthia, and E. by Styria; area, 2762 square miles; population, 215,000. It lies on the northern face of the eastern Alps, and is a mountainous region, attaining 12,000 feet in the Hohe Tauern. The river Salzach (190 miles), a tributary of the Inn, flows E. and then N. through one of the most picturesque of Alpine valleys. Salt is obtained, especially at Hallein (q.v.). Salzburg became Austrian in 1805.

SALZBURG, the capital, occupies a charming situation on the Salzach, by rail 195 miles W. by S. of Vienna and 80 miles E. by S. of Munich, where the river passes between two wooded rocks (1716 and 2133 feet); one of which, the Mönchsberg (Monk's Hill), is crowned by the old citadel, dating partly from Roman times. The river divides the city into two parts; on the west is the old city, with many dark, winding streets, getting access to the valley and plain on the north through a gallery (440 feet long, 39 feet high, and 23 feet wide), hewn (1767) in the solid rock of the Mönchsberg. This portion of the city contains the fine cathedral, with a white marble façade, and built (1614–34) in imitation of St Peter's at Rome; the Romanesque abbey church of St Peter (1127); the palace of the Grand-duke of Tuscany, in the Italian style (1592–1725); the Benedictine monastery, with a valuable library of 75,000 vols. and 1000 MSS.; and the archbishop's palace. On the opposite bank lies the modern town, with Italian-looking, flat-roofed houses; here the most prominent buildings are Castle Mirabell (1607); the Capuchin monastery (1599), and St Sebastian's Church (1512), with the monument of Paracelsus. The city possesses also a theological faculty, all that remains of the former university (1623–1810); a public library (1617) of 100,000 vols. and 1400 MSS.; a museum of Celtic and Roman antiquities, &c.; a bronze monument (1842) to Mozart, a native; a new park on the east bank; the government buildings (1588); the town-house (1407), &c. Industry is confined chiefly to the manufacture of musical instruments, marble ornaments, &c. Pop. 36,200. On the site of the Roman Juvavum, which was ruined by the Goths and Huns, Salzburg in the 6th c. was made the seat of a monastery. Its archbishops, who dated from 798, were princes of the empire, generally noted for severity; and in 1732, after five years' bitter persecution, 30,000 Protestants left their homes (as illustrated in Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea) and on the invitation of Frederick-William I. settled in Prussia.

Salzkammergut (Sahltzkammergoot'), called the Austrian Switzerland, one of the most picturesque districts of Europe, lies wedged between Salzburg on the W. and Styria on the E. Area, about 230 sq. m.; pop. 20,000. The scenery combines in rare beauty the features of valley, mountain, and lake. The highest peak is the Dachstein (9830 feet); of its lakes the most famous are Hallstatt, Traun or Gmunden, Atter, St Wolfgang, Aber, Mond, and Zell. It derives its name of 'Salt-exchequer Property' from its salt springs and mines, which yield about a third of Austria's total production of salt. The chief seats of the salt-works are Ischl, Hallstatt, and Ebensee.

Salzwedel (Sahltzvay'del), a town of Prussian Saxony, 72 miles by rail NW. of Magdeburg; pop. 15,000.

Samara (Samah'ra), a town of European Russia, on the Volga's left bank, at the influx of the Samara, 656 miles ESE. of Moscow by rail. It carries on a large river-trade, and has also tanneries, tobacco-factories, soap-works, iron-foundries, and brick-works. Consumptives resort to the koumiss (fermented mares' milk) establishments here. The population increased from 35,000 (1870) to 125,000 (1911).—The government has an area of 58,300 sq. m.; pop. 3,500,000 (100,000 Germans in agricultural colonies).

Samarang (Samah'rang), a seaport on the north of Java, 255 miles E. of Batavia, is the principal port of Middle Java, and is connected with Jokjokarta and Surabaya by railway; pop. 100,000.

Samarcand', a city of western Turkestan, on the Transcaspian railway, 4 miles S. of the Zerafshan river, and amongst the western spurs of the Tian-Shan Mountains, 130 miles E. by S. of Bokhara and 150 N. by E. of Balkh. It is the ancient Marcanda, the capital of Sogdiana, which was destroyed by Alexander the Great. It was captured in 712 A.D. by the Arabs, and has ever since been a sacred city in the eyes of the Moslems, especially after Timur made it his capital in the 14th century. It had, however, suffered terribly from Genghis Khan, who took it (1219) and destroyed three-fourths of its 500,000 inhabitants. In Timur's time it had a pop. of 150,000. The Ulug-beg College, the tombs of Timur and his wives, and two other colleges, the Tilla-Kari and Shir-dar, both dating from the beginning of the 17th century, are magnificent structures. In the 15th century Samarcand was renowned as a school of astronomy and mathematics. In 1868 it was taken from Bokhara by the Russians, who have built a citadel on a steep hill 4 miles in circuit, and have laid out a handsome new town to the west of it. On the other side of the citadel is the old city, walled, with dark and narrow streets, and dirty houses. Pop. 80,000.

Samaria, the capital of the northern kingdom of Israel, after Israel (the Ten Tribes) and Judah became two independent states. It was founded by Omri, on the long flat summit of an isolated hill (1450 feet), about 5 miles NW. of Shechem, and near the middle of Palestine. About 721 B.C. it fell before the three years' persistency of the Assyrian monarchs, Shalmaneser and Sargon, who carried away nearly all the Hebrew inhabitants of Samaria and Israel captive into Babylonia, sending in their place Assyrian colonists. The new settlers adopted many of the religious practices and beliefs of the remnant of the Israelites amongst whom they dwelt. When the Jews returned from the Captivity and set about the rebuilding of the temple, the Samaritans desired to share in the work; but the Jews rejected their assistance, and the Samaritans built (409 B.C.) on Mount Gerizim beyond Shechem a sanctuary to Jehovah as a rival to the temple at Jerusalem. This converted them into bitter enemies, so that henceforward the 'Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans.' The Samaritans adhered to the revised Pentateuch of Ezra as their sole religious code-book. At the present day there still survive 150 of them, collected at Nâblus, the ancient Shechem. The Samaritan language is an archaic Hebrew-Aramaic dialect; and in it are written a very ancient version of the Pentateuch, certain chronicles, hymns, and books of religious devotion. Samaria was taken by Alexander the Great, and colonised by Macedonians and Hellenised. Twice it was besieged and taken—by Ptolemy I. (312 B.C.), and by Demetrius Poliorcetes (c. 296). The Jewish captain John Hyrcanus laid siege to it (c. 110 B.C.), and at the end of a year destroyed it utterly. Nevertheless the Samaritans joined the Jews in offering fierce resistance to the Romans, who again destroyed the city. Herod refounded it under the name of Sebaste; and on its site, now called Sebastiya, there still exist parts of a colonnade of the age of Herod, remains of a temple to Augustus, and an old crusading church (now a mosque) built over the tomb of John the Baptist. The tombs of six or eight (Omri, Ahab, Jehu, &c.) of the kings of Israel and those of the prophets Obadiah and Elisha were also at Samaria.

Sambhal, a town in the United Provinces of India, 23 miles SW. of Moradabad. Pop. 40,000.

Sambor, a town in Austrian Galicia, on the Dniester, 41 miles SW. of Lemberg. Pop. 20,000.

Sambre (Son^{g}br), a river rising in the French dep. of Aisne, and flowing 112 miles NE., until at Namur in Belgium it joins the Meuse or Maas from the left. Many prehistoric remains have been discovered in caves in the Sambre valley.

Samland, a district of East Prussia, between the Frisch and Kurisch Haffs. Its western coast is known as the Amber (Bernstein) coast.

Sam'oa. The Samoa or Navigators' Islands are a group of islands in the Western Pacific, crossed by 170° W. and 14° S., between 400 and 500 miles NE. of Fiji. The group consists of nine islands, besides rocks and islets. All, except Rose Island, are volcanic, and are for the most part surrounded with coral-reefs. They are very mountainous, well wooded, and of very fertile soil. Four islands alone are of any size, Savaii, Upolu, Tutuila, and Manua (the latter really consisting of three small islands). Savaii, the westernmost and largest, is about 40 miles in length by 20 in breadth, and has an estimated area of 700 sq. m., and one peak which rises to near 5000 feet. Upolu, about 8 miles SE. of Savaii, has an area of between 550 and 600 sq. m.; on its northern side is the bay and harbour of Apia, the centre of all political and commercial life in the Samoan group. Thirty-six miles SE. of Upolu, Tutuila has a sheltered harbour in Pango Pango, or Pago Pago. The climate of Samoa is very moist and variable; the pleasantest time of the year is from May to November; during the rest of the year heavy gales and rains are frequent, and occasionally disastrous hurricanes occur—like that in which H.M.S. Calliope was safely guided out to sea, all the other ships being stranded. Copra, the dried kernel of the coconut, is the chief export; cocoa, cotton, coffee, tobacco, and cane-sugar being also grown. Fruit is plentiful, and bananas and citrons are exported to New Zealand and Australia. There are rich pastures, upon which imported live-stock thrive. The islands were visited by Bougainville in 1768, and from him they received the name of Îles des Navigateurs, as a tribute to the skill of the native boatmen. After 1889 Great Britain, Germany, and the United States recognised the independence of the Samoan government, making provision for a supreme court and the regulation of taxation and land-claims. By a further agreement between Britain, Germany, and the United States (1899–1900), Upolu and Savaii were assigned absolutely to Germany, and the other islands to the United States. The Samoans belong to the brown Polynesian race, and are a well-formed and prepossessing race, decreasing in numbers, the population being about 42,000, of whom 35,500 are in the German islands. The exports from the German islands of the group reach £150,000 a year, the imports a little less. From the United States islands the exports are £18,000, and the imports £18,000. The trade is mostly in the hands of German, British, and American firms. See works by R. L. Stevenson (1892), who from 1889 made Upolu his home, and is buried on the summit of Vailima Mountain, and by Kurze (1899), Ehlers (1900), Reinecke (1901), Kramer (1902), Mrs Churchill (1903).

Samogitia, a district in the Russian government of Kovno, inhabited by pure Lithuanians.

Samos, an island in the Ægean, close to the coast of Asia Minor, 45 miles SSW. of Smyrna; length is 30 miles, mean breadth 8, area 180 sq. m. The highest peak, Mount Kerki (anc. Cerceteus), reaches 4725 feet. Between Samos and the mainland is the narrow channel of Mycale, where in 479 B.C. the Persians were totally defeated by the Greeks. Between Samos and Nicaria (anc. Icaria) on the west is the Great Boghaz, 3 to 8 miles broad. Samos is well watered and very fertile; its principal product is wine, with olive-oil, carob beans, raisins, and hides. The chief industry is tanning. The capital of the island is Vathy (pop. 8000), on the north coast. The site of the ancient city of Samos is occupied by Tigani. The island was in ancient times celebrated for its red glossy pottery. Pop. of island about 54,000, all Greeks. A portion (from 84 B.C.) of the Roman province of Asia, and then a Byzantine possession, Samos was conquered by the Turks. When the war of independence broke out in 1821 no Greeks were more ardent patriots than the Samians; at the close of the struggle European policy assigned them to their former masters. From 1833 a Turkish tributary state, under a Greek prince and a native council, Samos declared for Greece in 1912, and was placed under Greek government.

Samos'ata (mod. Samisat), the capital till 73 A.D. of the Syrian kingdom of Commagene, on the Euphrates, 130 miles NNE. of Aleppo. It was the birthplace of Lucian.

Samothrace (Samothray'see), or SAMOTHRAKI, an island of the Ægean Sea, 40 miles NW. of the Dardanelles. It rises to 5248 feet in Mount Saoce (Phengari), which occupies nearly the whole of its surface (68 sq. m.). Bare and repellent, the island possesses no harbour and only one village, Chora, of 2000 inhabitants. Anciently it was celebrated for the worship of the Cabeiri, mysterious divinities whose temples were excavated in 1873–75 by Professor Conze. Parts of the cyclopean walls of the ancient city still remain. In 1457 it was conquered by the Turks, who then, and again in 1821, nearly exterminated the population. It was taken by the Greeks in 1912.

Samsö, a Danish island between Zealand and Jutland; area, 42 sq. m.; pop. 10,000.

Samsun, a seaport, with growing trade, on the Black Sea coast of Asiatic Turkey, 90 miles SE. of Sinope. Pop. 15,000.

Sanaa', the former capital of the Imáms of Yemen, 200 miles N. by W. of Aden, stands in a valley 4000 feet above the sea. Pop. 50,000.

San Antonio, capital of Bexar county, Texas, on the San Antonio River, 210 miles by rail W. of Houston. It has a Roman Catholic cathedral and seminary, an arsenal and government building, court-house, flour-mills, breweries, tanneries, &c. In Fort Alamo, across the river, Mexicans slaughtered the U.S. garrison of 188 men in 1836. Pop. 97,000.

San Carlos, a town of Venezuela, 125 miles SW. of Carácas; pop. 10,000.

San Cataldo, a town of Sicily, 10 miles W. of Caltanisetta; pop. 20,000.

Sanchi (San'tchee), a village in Bhopal state, on a rocky hill 5½ miles SW. of Bhilsa, is remarkable for its great Buddhist tope, dating from 250 B.C., with remains of ten smaller topes.

San Cristóbal, (1) a town of Chiapas state, Mexico; pop. 16,000.—(2) An inland town in the west of Venezuela; pop. 5000.

Sancti Spiritus. See SANTO ESPIRITU.

Sanda, an Argyllshire islet, 10 miles S. by E. of Campbeltown, 381 acres in area, and 405 feet high, with a lighthouse (1850); pop. 20.

Sandakan, the capital, founded about 1880, of the territory of the British North Borneo Company; pop. 6000.

Sandal Magna, a small town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, now part of Wakefield. Near it are the remains of the old castle of the Earls of Warren, ruined during the great Civil War.

Sandalwood Island, or SUMBA, one of the Sunda group in the Dutch East Indies. Area, 4385 sq. m.; pop. 200,000.

Sanday, an Orkney island, 2¼ miles N. of Stronsay. Area, 26 sq. m.; height, 173 feet; pop. 1500.

Sandbach, a market-town of Cheshire, near the right bank of the Wheelock, 5 miles NE. of Crewe. It has a good parish church, public rooms (1859), a grammar-school (1594), and manufactures of boots and shoes, fustian, iron, &c. Pop. 5700.

Sandbank and Ardnadam, an Argyllshire watering-place, on the S. shore of the Holy Loch, 2¾ miles NNW. of Dunoon; pop. 1000.

Sandec, NEU, a town of Galicia, 45 miles SE. of Cracow; pop. 25,000.

Sandefjord (j as y), a watering-place, 86 miles by rail SSW. of Christiania; pop. 5000.

Sandgate, a small watering-place on the south coast of Kent, within the parliamentary limits of Hythe, from which it is, however, nearly 3 miles E. by rail. Sandgate Castle dates from 1539; near by is Shorncliffe Camp. Two hundred houses were wrecked here by a land subsidence on 4th March 1893. Pop. 2300.

Sandhurst. See Bendigo.

Sandhurst Military College, Berkshire, 5 miles SSE. of Wokingham and 33 WSW. of London, dates from 1799, was transferred from Great Marlow in 1812, and remodelled in 1858.

San Diego (De-ay′go), the principal port of southern California, and capital of San Diego county, 124 miles by rail SSE. of Los Angeles. The beautiful bay, 6 miles long, forms an excellent harbour, and the port (extended in the 20th century) is a very busy one. Pop. 40,000.

San (or Santo) Domingo, capital of the Dominican Republic, on the south coast of Hayti, was founded by Bartholomew Columbus in 1496. The principal buildings are the Gothic cathedral (1514–40), where the ashes of Christopher Columbus rested from 1536 till 1796, a college, hospital, arsenal, and government buildings. Pop. 22,000.

San′doway, a district in the south of Arakan in Burma, named after its chief town (pop. 14,000), 15 miles from the mouth of a small river of the same name, and 150 miles NW. of Rangoon.

Sandown, a watering-place on the south-east coast of the Isle of Wight, 6 miles by rail S. of Ryde; pop. 5600.

Sandown Castle. See Deal.

Sandown Park, a race-course (130 acres) in Surrey, near Esher, 15 miles SW. of London.

San′dringham, a Norfolk estate, 3 miles from the sea and 7½ miles NNE. of Lynn. Comprising over 7000 acres, it was purchased in 1861 by the Prince of Wales (Edward VII.) for £220,000. The mansion was demolished, and the present hall built in 1869–71, a red-brick Elizabethan country-house, standing in a pleasant park of 200 acres; special features are the iron 'Norwich gates,' the dairy, and the splendid cottages. A fire on 1st November 1891 did damage to the amount of over £10,000. Sandringham was the scene of the death of the Duke of Clarence (14th January 1892). It was afterwards occupied by Queen Alexandra. See Mrs Herbert Jones, Sandringham, Past and Present (2d ed. 1888); W. A. Dutt, The King's Homeland (1904).

Sandus′ky, a port of Ohio, capital of Erie county, on the south shore of Sandusky Bay, an arm of Lake Erie, 56 miles by water (by rail 65) W. of Cleveland. The bay, 15 miles long and 5 wide, forms an excellent harbour. The city has machine-shops, railway-car factories, manufactories of cutlery and edge-tools, wheels, and especially of carved and turned woodwork. Pop. 20,000.

Sandwich (Sand′witch or -wij), a decayed seaport of Kent, on the right bank of the Stour, 12 miles E. of Canterbury and 68 (by rail 84) ESE. of London. It now stands 2 miles from the sea, or 4 if one follows the windings of the river; but in the 11th century, when Edward the Confessor made it one of the Cinque Ports, it was the 'most famous of all the English harbours.' It was the place of landing or embarkation of St Wilfrid, Canute, Becket, Cœur-de-Lion, &c.; under Edward IV. had 95 ships and 1500 mariners; but has never recovered the silting up of its harbour in the 16th century, in spite of the settlement at it of Protestant refugees (c. 1561), and of some harbour improvements since 1847. To-day its chief fame is as headquarters of golf. The old walls have been converted into a pleasant promenade, but it retains the Fisher Gate and Barbican, and offers a good deal of interest in its two churches and hospitals, guildhall (1579), grammar-school (1564), a house that lodged Queen Elizabeth, and other quaint old buildings. Richborough, 1½ mile N., was the Roman Rutupiæ, the predecessor of Sandwich, like which it declined as the sea receded from its port. A great fortress, 460 feet square, it still has a wealth of Roman remains—walls, towers, the base of a pharos, and an amphitheatre. Sandwich was made a borough by Edward III., and with Deal and Walmer returned two members, but was finally disfranchised in 1885. Pop. 3000. See works by Boys (1792), Smith (1830), Bell (1831), and Montagu Burrows (1888).

Sandwich Islands. See Hawaii.

Sandy Hook, a narrow sandy peninsula of New Jersey, between the Atlantic and Sandy Hook Bay, 16 miles S. of New York. It is 6 miles long, and extends northward towards New York Lower Bay. On it are a lighthouse, with a most powerful electric light (1893–94), a fort, and a life-saving station.

Sandyknowe. See Smailholm.

Sandy Point. See Patagonia.

San Felipe (Faylee′pay), (1) capital of the Chilian province of Aconcagua, 60 miles ENE. of Valparaiso; pop. 12,000.—(2) A town in the west of Venezuela, 140 miles W. by S. of Carácas; pop. 7000. See also Jativa.

San Fernando, a Spanish town, near the head of a bay, 9 miles SSE. of Cadiz; pop. 25,000.

San Francisco, the largest city of the Pacific coast, and commercial emporium of California, is situated in 37° 47′ 22″ N. lat. and 122° 25′ 40·76″ W. long., 2434 miles W. of St Louis by rail, and 3542 of New York. The city occupies the end of a peninsula or tongue of land, having the ocean on one side and the Bay of San Francisco on the other. The site is uneven; from two heights (294 and 360 feet) the land inclines gently towards the bay. The entrance to this landlocked bay is through the Golden Gate, 5 miles long and 1 mile wide, with a depth of 100 feet, but only 30 feet on the bar at the entrance. The Bay of San Francisco extends to the S. about 40 miles, varying in width from 6 to 12 miles. Northwards, this bay connects by a strait with San Pablo Bay (10 miles long), which again is connected with Suisun Bay (8 miles long). The Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers debouch near the head of Suisun Bay. Nearly in front of the city are three important islands—Alcatraz (fortified), Angel Island (fortified), and Yerba Buena or Goat Island. Most of the pioneer wooden business structures have been replaced by reinforced concrete, or by marble, granite, and terra-cotta, with interior frames of iron and steel. There are several theatres and opera-houses, a sub-treasury, mint, stock exchange, and other structures of less note. The old city hall, the custom-house, and the Palace Hotel were among the great buildings destroyed in 1906, and since rebuilt. There are about a dozen public squares; the Golden Gate Park, extending along the coast for three miles, covers an area of over 1000 acres. The Roman Catholic cathedral, the Unitarian church, Grace Church, and the First Congregational Church are notable religious edifices. The state university is at Berkeley, and the Leland Stanford University at Palo Alto (33 miles SE. by rail). The higher institutions of the city include the law, medical, dental, art, and other departments of the state university, medical colleges, and the School of Mechanic Arts (founded by a bequest from James Lick of $540,000). The Public Library, the Mechanics-Mercantile Library, the Law Library, and other great collections were wholly, or almost wholly, destroyed by the fire of 1906; but some of them have been re-established. Most of the streets are laid out in rectangular form, and with little reference to the conformation of the surface. In the rebuilding of the city after the earthquake of 18th April 1906 and the fire that followed it, the old street lines were as a rule retained. The rebuilding was done in about three years. The cable tramway was invented in San Francisco, but has been superseded by electric tramways.

San Francisco is the western terminus of the great continental railroads and of many short lines, and has steamer communication with the ports of the world. The bay is accessible to the largest vessels. Harbour improvements were undertaken in 1909. San Francisco is one of the most important grain ports in the United States; and gold and silver, wine, fruit, and wool are exported (largely in British bottoms). There are large sugar-refineries, foundries, shipyards, cordage-works, wood-factories, woollen-mills, and many others. The mission of San Francisco was founded by the Mexicans in 1776, but the present city sprang from the village of Yerba Buena, 3 miles E., founded in 1835, which became American in 1846. In 1848, the year of the Californian gold discovery, the pop. was 500; (1850) 25,000; (1870) 149,473; (1910) 416,912, including many Chinese (mainly in the curious 'Chinese quarter,' with its own joss-houses, theatres, and opium-dens). Anti-Chinese agitation has long been known, and with the increase of the Japanese population an anti-Japanese movement has arisen, which threatened to embroil the United States with Japan. These, with municipal scandals, have been the chief events in the recent history of San Francisco, apart from the disasters of 1906. See California, and works there cited.

San Francisco del Rincon, a town of Mexico, 40 miles W. of Guanajuato; pop. 12,000.

San Fratello, a town of Sicily, 53 miles WSW. of Messina; pop. 10,000.

Sangir Islands (Sangeer'; g hard), a group of fifty mountainous volcanic islands, lying between the Philippines and Celebes; area, 323 sq. m.; pop. 115,000. The largest, Great Sangir, is 28 miles long by 9 broad; the eruption of Abu in 1856 cost 6000 lives. The people are Malays, ruled by chiefs under Dutch suzerainty.

Sang-koi. See Tonquin.

San Joaquin (San Wah-keen'), a river of California, rises in the Sierra Nevada, and runs 400 miles SW. and NNW. to Suisun Bay, near the mouth of the Sacramento River.

San José, capital of Santa Clara county California, on the Guadalupe River, 8 miles from the Bay and 50 by rail SE. of the city of San Francisco. Besides a fine court-house and a city hall, it contains the state normal school and a Roman Catholic college for girls; and the University of the Pacific (Methodist Episcopal; 1852) and the Roman Catholic Santa Clara College are at Santa Clara, close by. Lick Avenue extends from San José to the Lick Observatory. The city has wide streets and three parks, is noted for its gardens and fruit, and has miscellaneous industries. It suffered from the 1906 earthquake. Much wine is made in the district. Pop. 29,000.

San José (San Ho-zay'), the capital since 1823 of Costa Rica, on a fertile plain 3711 feet above the sea, 25 miles from Carillo. It is on the trans-continental railway between Punta Arenas and Limon. There are a government distillery, steam flour-mills, and foundries. San Luis Potosi (Potozee'), capital of the Mexican state of the same name, stands on the edge of a plateau, 7400 feet above the sea, 362 miles by rail NNW. of Mexico city. It contains a handsome cathedral, railway workshops, a cotton-factory, and great smelting-works. There are silver-mines near by. Pop. 83,000.—The state has an area of 25,300 sq. m. and a pop. of 628,000.

San Marco in Lamis, a town of south Italy, 18 miles N. of Foggia; pop. 20,000.

San Marino (Maree'no), an Italian republic, the smallest independent state of Europe, lies among the eastern spurs of the Apennines, 9 miles SW. of Rimini on the Adriatic; area, 33 sq. m.; pop. 11,000, including a town of the same name (pop. 1600) and some villages. The town is built on a mountain crag, and is accessible only by one road; the streets are steep and narrow. In the 13th century San Marino cast in its lot with the house of Urbino; but on the annexation of this duchy to the Papal States in 1631 the independence of San Marino was recognised, and has since been maintained, though it acknowledges the king of Italy as its protector. From the Grand Council of sixty members is selected the Council of Twelve. The executive is committed to two captains-regent.

San Miguel′ (Meegayl′), a town of Salvador, at the foot of a volcano (7775 feet). Pop. 25,000.

San Miguel Alende, a town of Mexico, on the side of a high hill overlooking the Rio de la Lara, 253 miles by rail NW. of Mexico. Pop. 20,000.

Sanquhar (Sang′har or Sang′kar), a town of Dumfriesshire, on the Nith, 26 miles NNW. of Dumfries. It has a ruined castle, was the birthplace of the 'Admirable' Crichton, and has many Covenanting memories. The Corda of Ptolemy, it was made a royal burgh in 1598, and with Dumfries, &c. returns one member. Pop. 1500. See James Brown's History of Sanquhar (1891).

San Remo (Ray′mo), a city of Northern Italy, stands on rising ground on a bay of the Gulf of Genoa, 26 miles by rail ENE. of Nice and 84 SW. of Genoa. The shelter of the hills behind and its delightful climate make it one of the favourite winter-resorts of the Riviera, especially for Englishmen and Germans. There are two quarters, an old town of steep, narrow streets, and a new town of handsome streets and picturesque villas, hotels, and palaces. Pop. 23,000.

San Roque, a town of Spain, 8 miles N. by W. of Gibraltar. Pop. 10,000.

San Salvador′, or Banza Congo, a decayed town of Africa, in Portuguese Angola, 170 miles E. by S. of the Congo's mouth. Pop. 700.

San Salvador′, the capital of the republic of Salvador (q.v.), stands in the midst of a fertile plateau, among green hills, and at the foot of the extinct volcano of San Salvador (8360 feet). The government buildings are handsome; the cathedral is unfinished. San Salvador was founded in 1528, and in 1854, when it had a pop. of 25,000, was destroyed by an earthquake. A town of Nueva San Salvador (pop. 20,000) was built 12 miles SW. Violent shocks of earthquake have since visited the capital in 1873, 1879, and 1891. Pop. 60,000.—San Salvador is also a name for Bahia (q.v.), and for Cat Island in the Bahamas (q.v.).

Sansanding, or Sansandig, a town of Africa, on the Niger's left bank, 370 miles SW. of Timbuctoo. Pop. 20,000.

San Sebastián, a fortress and seaport in the north of Spain, 402 miles by rail NNE. of Madrid, and 11 from the French frontier. It is built on a peninsula, stretching from the base of a conical hill, Orgullo (400 feet), which is crowned with a strong castle. Since its storming by Wellington (1813), the town has been rebuilt on a regular plan. On the west is a magnificent roadstead, but difficult of access. It is bordered by a beautiful shore, which attracts many summer visitors. Most of the loading and unloading is done at Pasages, 2½ miles E. The imports include coal, metals, fish, spirits, and yarn; the exports wine, minerals, textiles, and matches. Pop. 50,000.

San Severo (Sevay′ro), a cathedral city of Italy, 18 miles by rail NW. of Foggia. Pop. 30,000.

San Stef′ano, a village 6 miles W. of Constantinople.

Santa Ana, a town of Salvador, 40 miles NNE. of Sonsonate. Pop. 60,000.

Santiago. See Cape Verd Islands.

Santiago (San-tee-âh'go), the capital of Chili, stands near the western base of the Andes, 1700 feet above sea-level, and 115 miles by rail ESE. of Valparaiso. The snow-capped cordilleras seem to enclose it on the north and east; while in the east of the city rises the picturesque Cerro de Santa Lucia (800 feet above the plain), dotted with grottoes, statues, kiosks, restaurants, a historical museum, and an observatory. The small but turbulent stream, the Mapocho, is crossed by five bridges. The city is regularly laid out, lit with gas and the electric light, and has tramways in all directions; most of the houses are of one story only, owing to the earthquakes (the most serious occurred in 1575, 1647, 1730, 1822, 1835, 1906). On the great Plaza Independencia are the government palaces, the Grand English Hotel, the cathedral, and the archbishop's palace. On the site of the Jesuit church, burned down in 1863, a monument was erected (1872) in memory of the 2000 worshippers who perished in the fire. Santiago boasts a noble Alameda, adorned with four rows of poplars and statues. Facing it are the university (1842), and the National Institute. The city has also a military school, schools of arts and agriculture, a conservatoire, a national library (1813), with 102,000 volumes; botanical and zoological gardens, &c. The manufactures include cloth, ship's biscuits, beer, brandy, &c., and it has also an ice-factory, a fruit-conserving establishment, and copper-smelting works. Santiago was founded by Pedro de Valdivia in 1541. Pop. 360,000.—Area of the province, 5223 sq. m.; pop. 550,000.

Santiago de Compostella, a city of Spain, the former capital of Galicia, stands surrounded by hills, 33 miles S. by W. of Corunna and 26 by rail NE. of its port, Carril. Here in 835 the bishop of Iria discovered, according to the legend, the bones of St James (San Iago), being guided to the spot by a star, whence Compostella (campus stellæ = 'field of the star'); the relics were in 1884 solemnly affirmed by the pope to be still beneath the cathedral. This building, Romanesque in style, was built 1078–1188, and contains some fine sculptures and metal-work. It was the shrine that attracted every 25th July so many thousands of pilgrims, especially Englishmen, in the middle ages, but is now out of repute. Ruined monasteries give the town a deserted appearance; but it is still an archbishop's see, and has a university (1504) with 800 students. Ornaments are made and linen is woven. Pop. 25,000.

Santiago de Cuba, the former capital of Cuba, and now the chief town of the eastern department of the island, stands on a bay on the south coast, and has a fortified harbour. It contains a cathedral and seminary, foundries, cigar-factories, sawmills, &c. Pop. 53,600.

Santiago del Estero (Santeeâh'go del Es'tero), a north central province of the Argentine Republic. Area, 39,510 sq. m.; pop. 216,700.—The capital, Santiago, on the Rio Dulce, 750 miles by rail NNW. of Buenos Ayres, was founded in 1553. Pop. 10,000.

Santipur', a town of Bengal on the Hooghly, 43 miles N. of Calcutta. Pop. 30,000.

Säntis, or Sentis, a mountain (8216 feet) on the borders of the Swiss cantons of St Gall and Appenzell. There are on it an observatory (since 1887) and a hotel.

Santo Domingo. See San Domingo.

Santo Espiritu (Sancti Spiritus), a town of Cuba, 40 miles by rail ENE. of Trinidad. Pop. 14,000.

Santorin', or Thera, an island of the Ægean, the southernmost of the Cyclades, 70 miles N. of Crete. It is shaped like a crescent, the horns pointing west; between them lies the island of Therasia. In the SE. of Santorin Mount St Elias rises to 1887 feet. The chief town, Thera or Phera, on the west coast of Santorin, is perched some 900 feet above the water. Pop. of island, about 20,000. Eruptions took place in 196 B.C., 726 A.D., 1573, 1650, 1707, and 1866.

Santos, a port of the state of São Paulo in Brazil, founded in 1546, on the island of São Vicente. It has rapidly developed into the second port of Brazil and the greatest coffee port of the world. A railway (40 miles, 5 of them by cable up the Serra do Mar—2500 feet) connects it with São Paulo, whose port it is. Pop. 80,000.

San Vicente, a pretty town of Salvador, 40 miles NE. of San Salvador; pop. 20,000.

São Francisco (Sown^{g} Fransees'ko), a large river of Brazil, rises in Minas Geraes, and flows 1800 miles to the Atlantic.

São-Leopoldo, a town of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, 20 miles N. of Porto Alegre. Pop. 10,000, mainly Germans.

Saône (Sone), a river of France, an affluent of the Rhone (q.v.), rises in the dep. of Vosges, in the Faucelles Mountains, and flows 282 miles (170 navigable) SW. and S. to the Rhone at Lyons. It receives the Doubs from the left. See Hamerton's illustrated description of the river (1887).

Saône, Haute (Ote Sone), a dep. in the east of France. Area, 2061 sq. m.; pop. (1861) 317,183; (1911) 257,606. The arrondissements are Gray, Lure, and Vesoul (the capital).

Saône-et-Loire (Sone-ay-Lwar), one of the largest deps. of France, part of Burgundy. Area, 3300 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 598,344; (1911) 604,446. There are arrondissements of Autun, Chalon, Charolles, Louhan, and Mâcon (the capital).

São Paulo (Sown^{g} Pow'lo), capital of a Brazilian state, stands on a wide plain bounded by low hills, 4 miles from the Rio Tiete and 310 by rail W. by S. of Rio de Janeiro. The principal buildings are the old Jesuit college, now the government palace, the bishop's palace, and a celebrated law-school. São Paulo is the headquarters of the coffee trade, and has cotton-works, with manufactories of tobacco, cigars, spirits, matches, gloves, and hats. Pop. 400,000, including many Italians and Germans.—The state has an area of 112,330 sq. m. and a pop. of 3,200,000.

São Thome. See St Thomas.

Saragossa (Span. Saragoza), a city of Spain, formerly capital of Aragon, by rail 212 m. NE. of Madrid, on the Ebro, which is crossed by a noble stone bridge of seven arches, built in 1437. From afar it has an imposing appearance with its many towers and spires. Saragossa was the Celtiberian Salduba, changed to Cœsarea Augusta in 25 B.C., of which the present name is a corruption. One of the first cities of Spain to adopt Christianity (3d century), it was taken by the Goths in the 5th and by the Moors in the 8th century, and was recovered from them in 1118 after a five years' siege, during which great part of the inhabitants died of hunger. The most momentous event in its recent history was the siege by the French (June to August 1808 and December 1808 to February 1809), in which the inhabitants offered a most determined resistance, some 60,000 in all perishing. The services of the 'Maid of Saragossa' seem to have been greatly exaggerated by Southey, Byron, and Sir David Wilkie. Saragossa has two cathedrals, the older a Gothic edifice (1316); the more modern (17th century) boasts of a pillar on which the Virgin descended from heaven. The citadel was anciently the palace of the kings of Aragon and later the headquarters of the Inquisition. There are also a university (1474) with 800 students, and a large archiepiscopal palace. The leaning Torre Nueva, dating from 1504, was in 1890 voted unsafe and doomed to demolition. The industries comprise cloth, silks, leather, soap, and chocolate. Pop. 108,800.—The province has an area of 6727 sq. m. and a pop. of 442,000.

Sarajevo (Sarī-yay-vo; Turkish Bosna-Serai), capital of Bosnia, stands on the hill-slopes that overlook the Bosna River (3 miles distant), 166 miles SW. by rail of Bosna-Brod, on the Danube, and 100 E. by rail (1891) of Metkovich, a port near the mouth of the Narenta in the Adriatic. The citadel and the minarets of 100 mosques, the crowded charsia or bazaar, and the steep and narrow streets climbing the hillsides amidst gardens, represent the ancient moslem town; the wide streets on the plain near the railway station, traversed by tramways and lit with the electric light, the Roman Catholic Cathedral, and the Bosnian museum reflect the swift progress that has taken place since the Austrian occupation in 1878. The Bogova-Jamia mosque dates from 1506; the Greek Cathedral is a large building; and the Moslem College (1890) is a fine building in Oriental style. The town has considerable trade, and manufactures tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes; the ancient Bosnian art of inlaying gold and silver in copper and wood has been revived. Pop. 52,000, nearly all Bosniaks by race, and more than half Mohammedans, with almost equal numbers of Greek and Roman Catholics, and many Jews.

Sarakhs, a town of NE. Persia, mainly a collection of Turkoman huts, with a strong fort, stands on the Heri-Rud. The Russians in 1885 occupied the opposite bank.

Saransk, a town of Russia, 65 miles N. of Penza. Pop. 20,000.

Saraswati. See Allahabad.

Saratoff (Sar-âh'toff), a city of Russia, on the Volga's right bank, exactly 500 miles by rail SE. of Moscow. It is a city of broad streets and fine squares, and stands on terraces rising from the river. There are a handsome new cathedral (1825), an old cathedral (1697), and the museum with its art gallery and a library. Manufactures of brandy, liqueurs, flour, oil, and tobacco are carried on. Fishing is prosecuted in the river, and market-gardening (especially fruit and the sun-flower) in the vicinity. The population is about 200,000.—The government, the east side of which is washed by the Volga, has an area of 32,624 sq. m. and a pop. of over 3,000,000, including several flourishing German colonies which settled here in 1763–65.

Saratoga Springs, one of the chief watering-places in the United States, is on a monotonous plateau in New York, 38 miles by rail N. of Albany. It contains about 30 mineral springs, whose saline waters (some chalybeate, some sulphureous, and all impregnated with carbonic acid), prescribed in diseases of the liver, chronic dyspepsia, rheumatism, &c., are bottled in large quantities for exportation. The hotels provide for 20,000 visitors, and life in Saratoga is notorious for luxury. There is a race-track, and regattas are held on Saratoga Lake, 4 miles distant. Twelve miles to the east a handsome obelisk (1877), 155 feet high, on a bluff 350 feet above the Hudson River and overlooking the scene, commemorates the surrender of Burgoyne to Gates, on October 17, 1777. Pop. 12,700.

Sarawak (Sar-âh'wak), a state in the north-west of Borneo, since 1888 a British protectorate. The Chinese Sea washes its north-west side; on the north-east is the protected state of Brunei; and on every other side it is surrounded by Dutch Borneo. Area 42,000 sq. m.; pop. 600,000. The coast-belt is in many parts low, the interior hilly, rising to close upon 8000 feet near the frontiers. The longest river, the Rajang, has a sinuous course of 350 miles, and is navigable for 150 miles. Antimony, quicksilver, gold, and coal are mined, and copper, diamonds, and manganese exist. Sago, pepper, gambier, gutta-percha, india-rubber, birds' nests, rattans, tea, coffee, and timber, are exported. The people consist principally of Malays, Chinese, and Dyaks. The chief town, Kuching (pop. 25,000), stands 20 miles up the Sarawak River. Sir James Brooke (1803–68), who became Rajah of Sarawak in 1841, was succeeded by his nephew, Sir C. J. Brooke, who, after greatly extending his territory, put it in 1888 under the protection of Britain. See books by St John (1862–99), Charles Brooke (1866), Ling Roth (1899), Baring-Gould and Bampfylde (1909), and Lady Brooke (1913).

Sardes. See Sardis.

Sardinia, an island of Italy, after Sicily the largest in the Mediterranean, lies 135 miles W. of the Tiber mouth, and immediately south of Corsica, being separated from it by the Strait of Bonifacio, 7½ miles wide. It is 170 miles long from N. to S., and 75 miles broad; area, 9206 sq. m. The surface is generally mountainous, the highest point (6233 feet) is Gennargentu. The south-west corner is separated from the rest by the low alluvial plain of Campidano, at both extremities of which are extensive salt lagoons. Malaria prevails in the low-lying tracts; the higher parts are healthy. Sardinia has a fertile soil, valuable mines, and forests, and fisheries; but owing to conservatism, apathy, lack of enterprise, and imperfect means of communication, its resources are undeveloped. Of the total area about one-third is arable land, one-third pasture, and nearly one-third forest. The principal produce is wheat, barley, beans, potatoes, wine, olive-oil, oranges, lemons, tobacco, flax and hemp, cheese, butter, and wool. The growing of fruits and the breeding of the domestic animals are important industries. Besides being in ancient times the granary of Rome, Sardinia was renowned for its mineral wealth. At the present time some 12,000 persons are employed in extracting lead (with silver) and zinc, lignite, antimony, and manganese. Iron and copper also exist. Granite, marble, and clay for pottery are quarried. Salt is manufactured from sea-water. The centre and north of the island are chiefly covered with forests—oak, ilex, cork, and wild-olive—which yield timber, cork, bark for tanning, acorns, and charcoal. The seas (to Italian, not Sardinian, fishermen) yield large quantities of tunny, sardines, anchovy, and coral. There is some tanning and making of cigars, aerated waters, macaroni, flour, and spirits. Until the year 1828 Sardinia had no roads for wheeled vehicles, the Roman roads having gone to ruin centuries ago. Now there are good roads throughout the island; and they are supplemented by 600 miles of railway. The island has good ports—Cagliari (the capital) being the chief. The inhabitants are of mixed race, Spanish and Italian elements predominating. Pop. (1815) 352,867; (1881) 682,000; (1911) 853,000—91·6 to the sq. m. Education is in a very backward state. The two universities at Cagliari and Sassari are frequented by 400 students; 73 per cent. of the population are unable to read and write. The vendetta and brigandage were extremely prevalent, but have now almost ceased. The language is a mixture of Latin, Spanish, and Italian, but the dialects differ considerably; classical Italian is the official language. The moufflon or wild sheep, deer, and wild boar, are hunted. There are two provinces of Cagliari and Sassari. Some 3000 nuraghe or round towers, and many 'giant's graves,' are prehistoric or very ancient curiosities. See works by Tennant (1885), Tyndale (3 vols. 1849), and Edwardes (1889).

Sardis, the capital of ancient Lydia in Asia Minor, stood, on the golden-sanded Pactolus, at the northern foot of Mount Tmolus (5906 feet) and 2½ miles S. of the Hermus. On its site is Sart, a small village, with ruin mounds.

Sargasso Sea. See Atlantic Ocean.

Sari (Sâh'ree), the decayed capital of the province of Mazanderan, Persia, 18 miles S. of the Caspian Sea. Pop. 8000.

Sar-i-kol, or Sariq-qol, a great valley or depression in Eastern or Chinese Turkestan, on the eastern side of the Pamir plateau.

Sark (Fr. Gers), the smallest of the four Channel Islands (q.v.), 6 miles E. of Guernsey and 12 NNW. of Jersey. Almost entirely rockbound, and only 2 sq. m. in area, it consists of two portions, Great and Little Sark, connected by an isthmus. Fishing and agriculture are the occupations. Pop. 600.

Sark, a Dumfriesshire stream, winding 11¼ miles SSW. (mainly along the Border) to the head of the Solway Firth.

Sarnen, capital of one of the divisions of the Swiss canton of Unterwalden, lies on its own lake, 15 miles S. of Lucerne by rail. Pop. 5000.

Sarnia, a town and port of Canada, just below the issue from Lake Huron of the St Clair River, 170 miles WSW. of Toronto by rail; pop. 10,000. See St Clair.

Sarno, a city of Italy, 30 miles by rail E. of Naples, on the farther side of Vesuvius, has an old castle, a cathedral (1625), paper, cotton, linen, silk, and ribbon manufactories. Pop. 20,000.

Sarrakhs. See Sarakhs.

Sarreguemines. See Saargemund.

Sarthe (Sâhrt), a dep. of France, north of the Loire, formed out of Anjou and Maine. Area, 2396 sq. m.; pop. (1866) 465,615; (1911) 419,370.

Sarum. See Salisbury.

Sarzana (Sartzâh'na), a cathedral city of N. Italy, 8 miles by rail E. of Spezia. Pop. 10,000.

Sasebo, a great naval port of Japan, on the west coast of Kiushiu, 30 miles N. of Nagasaki. Pop. 93,000.

Saskatch'ewan, a large river of Canada, whose North Branch rises among the glaciers near Mount Hooker, its South Branch in the north of Montana, flowing respectively 770 and 810 miles before they meet. The river then flows east 282 miles to Lake Winnipeg, from which its waters are carried to Hudson Bay by the Nelson River (q.v.), rendered unnavigable by rapids. With the Nelson, the total length is 1514 miles. The river gives name to a province of the Dominion, constituted in 1905 out of the former territory of Saskatchewan, together with half of Athabasca, and the greater part of Assiniboia; the extended Alberta absorbing the rest. Saskatchewan has great areas of fertile wheat-land. Area of the province, 252,000 sq. m.; pop. 492,400. Regina (pop. 30,000) is the capital.

Saskatoon, a university town of Saskatchewan, on the Saskatchewan River and Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Pacific Railways; pop. 12,000.

Sassari (Sass'aree), a city of NW. Sardinia, 12 miles by rail from its port, Porto Torres (pop. 4500), on the Gulf of Asinara. It has a cathedral (1531), castle (1331), &c. Pop. 43,000.

Sasun, or Sassoon, a small town of Armenia, 50 miles W. of Bitlis.

Sátárá (Satâh'ra), a town of Bombay, near the Kistna, 56 miles S. of Poona. Pop. 30,000.

Satoralja-Ujhely, a town of Hungary, 30 miles SE. of Kaschau. Pop. 20,000.

Sauchie (Saw'hee), or Sauchieburn, a battlefield 3 miles SSW. of Stirling, where in 1488 James III. was defeated and slain.

Saugor. See Sagar.

Sault Ste Marie, a town of Ontario, Canada (pop. 11,000), and one in Michigan (pop. 12,000), separated by the St Mary's River and the St Mary's Falls ship-canal, which connect Lake Huron with Lake Superior. A vast system of locks simplifies the navigation; the falls or rapids (Sault, pron. soo) generate electrical energy, which is largely utilised for various industries. A great bridge links the (American) North Pacific and the Canadian Pacific railways.

Saumur (Somür', nearly So-meer'), a town of France, dep. Maine-et-Loire, on the left bank and on an islet of the Loire, 38 miles by rail W. by S. of Tours. It has an old castle (now arsenal and powder magazine), a 16th-century town-house, a museum, and a cavalry school with some 400 pupils. Rosaries and articles in enamel are manufactured. Pop. 15,000. Saumur was a Huguenot stronghold with 25,000 inhabitants, and from 1598 till the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) had a famous school of Protestant theology. Saumur was captured by the Vendeans in 1793. The largest dolmen in France is 1½ mile S.; and prehistoric caves line the river.

Saundersfoot, a Pembrokeshire seaport village on Carmarthen Bay, 3½ miles NE. of Tenby.

Sauternes, a village of the dep. of Gironde, 18 miles SE. of Bordeaux, noted for its white wines.

Savage Island, or Niue, a coral islet (of New Zealand, 1901) E. of Tonga; pop. 4000.

Savaii. See Samoa.

Savanilla, a port of Colombia, on a bay of the Caribbean Sea, 17 miles WNW. of Barranquilla by the railway to Puerto Colombia.

Savan'nah, a river which forms the boundary between Georgia and South Carolina, rises near the North Carolina frontier, and flows 450 miles SSE. to the Atlantic. It is navigable from November to June for large vessels to Savannah, for steamboats of 150 tons to Augusta.

Savannah, a city and port of Georgia, capital of Chatham county, stretches along the south bank of the Savannah River, 18 miles from its mouth, and 115 by rail SW. of Charleston. It is built on a sandy plain, 40 feet above the river, with broad streets shaded by beautiful trees. The dozens of parks are a delightful feature of the place; and almost in the centre of the city is Forsyth Place (30 acres), thickly planted with forest pines. Here is a monument to the Confederate dead; and others in the city commemorate General Nathaniel Greene and Count Pulaski, who fell here. The chief edifices are the custom-house, city exchange, cotton exchange, court-house, Hodgson Hall, the Telfair Academy of Arts and Sciences, a Roman Catholic cathedral, the Independent Presbyterian Church, Christ Church, on the site of the chapel where John Wesley first ministered to the colonists, and the hospitals and asylums. Savannah has long been the first naval stores station, and is one of the principal cotton-exporting ports of the United States. Other articles of export are spirits of turpentine, resin, lumber, rice, and cotton-seed. The imports include fertilisers, brimstone, fruit, cotton ties, and salt. The industrial works comprise rice-mills, foundries, planing-mills, flour, cotton, and paper mills, cotton-presses, packing-houses, ice and furniture factories, &c. The city was founded in 1733, and incorporated in 1789. It was taken by the British in 1778, and by General Sherman in December 1864, the harbour having been closed to commerce by the Federal fleet from 1861. Pop. 65,000.

Save (Ger. Sau; Hung. Száva), a river in S. Austria, rises in Carniola, and flows 556 miles (366 navigable) SE. and E., separating Carniola from Styria, and Bosnia and Servia from Slavonia, till it falls into the Danube at Belgrade.

Savernake, a beautiful woodland region in Wiltshire, to the south of the town of Marlborough. Its 40,000 acres of farm and forest and hill were sold in 1891 to Lord Iveagh for £750,000 by the Marquis of Ailesbury—a sale, however, cancelled two years later.

Savigliano (Saveelyah'no), a town of Italy, by rail 32 miles S. of Turin; pop. 10,000.

Savoie and Haute-Savoie. See Savoy.

Savo'na, a seaport of Italy, on the Gulf of Genoa, 26 miles by rail S. by W. of Genoa and 91 SSE. of Turin. A handsome modern town embowered in orange-groves, it has a Renaissance cathedral (1589–1604), with the tomb of Pope Sixtus IV.; a castle (1542), now a prison, in which Mazzini was confined in 1830–31; the Della Rovere Palace, a picture-gallery, a marine institute, ironworks, potteries, glass-works, tanneries, and brick-yards. Pop. 50,000.

Savoy', formerly a province of the kingdom of Sardinia, was transferred to France in 1860, and divided into the two deps. of Savoie and Haute-Savoie. It is an alpine region, having the Graian Alps on the eastern frontier, as the boundary next Piedmont. On that side it runs up to 15,782 feet in Mont Blanc, and to 11,792 in Mont Cenis; thence it falls away gradually to the Rhone (950 feet), which separates it on the west from the French dep. of Ain. The area is 4162 sq. m. (2388 in Savoie and 1774 in Haute-Savoie); the total pop. (1881) 540,525; (1911) 503,027, of whom 247,890 were in Savoie and 255,137 in Haute-Savoie. The dep. of Savoie has the four arrondissements of Albertville, Chambéry (the capital), Moûtiers, St Jean-de-Maurienne; Haute-Savoie has the four arrondissements of Annecy (the capital), Bonneville, St-Julien, Thonon.

Savu', an island of the East Indies, lies W. of Timor, and is ruled by five Malay rajahs who pay tribute to the Dutch. Pop. 16,000.

Sawbridgeworth, a town of Herts, on the Stort, 4 miles S. of Bishop Stortford; pop. of urban district, 2300.

Sawley, a Derbyshire village, on the Trent, 8½ miles ESE. of Derby. Pop. of parish, 3300.

Saxe-Coburg, &c. See Saxon Duchies.

Saxmundham, a Suffolk market-town, 22½ miles NE. of Ipswich. Pop. of urban dist., 1400.

Saxon Duchies, a group of Central German states lying between Prussian Saxony, the kingdom of Saxony, Bavaria, and Hesse-Nassau.

State.	Area in sq. m.	Pop. in 1910.
Saxe-Altenburg	511	216,313
Saxe-Coburg-Gotha	755	257,208
Saxe-Meiningen	953	278,792
Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach	1387	417,166

Altenburg and Coburg-Gotha each consists of two principal portions, with smaller fragments; Weimar-Eisenach embraces three large divisions; and Meiningen has detached parcels. Except the easternmost part of Altenburg, they are all generally hilly, embracing the Thuringian highlands, and are watered by the Elbe's tributaries—the Saale, Unstrut, Ilm, and Elster—and by the Werra. The four duchies maintain the university of Jena. At the head of each is a duke (in Weimar a grand-duke), controlled or assisted by an assembly. To the house of Saxe-Coburg, an independent duchy since 1680, belonged both the mother of Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort; the dukedom passed in 1893 to the Duke of Edinburgh, and in 1900 to the son of the Duke of Albany.

Sax'ony, a kingdom of Germany, fifth in area, but third in population, amongst the states of the empire; it is surrounded by Bohemia, Silesia, Prussian Saxony, and the minor Saxon states. It measures 130 miles E. and W. by 90 miles, and has a total area of 5787 sq. m. (a little smaller than Yorkshire). The greater part of the surface is diversified by the spurs of the Erzgebirge (highest point 3343 feet), with to the west the outliers (2900 feet) of the Fichtelgebirge and to the east the northern extensions (2600 feet) of the Riesengebirge. The northern districts pass over into the great North German plain. In many parts the surface is studded with isolated peaks of basalt and sandstone (e.g. the Saxon Switzerland above Dresden). It lies almost wholly within the basin of the Elbe. The population grows fast: (1815) 1,178,802; (1840) 1,706,276; (1880) 2,972,805; (1910) 4,802,485. By race the majority of the people are Germanised Slavs, more than 50,000 being Wends, living in Lusatia; more than 94 per cent. are Lutherans, though the royal dynasty is Catholic. The capital is Dresden; the largest towns are Leipzig, Dresden, and Chemnitz, having respectively about 560,000, 548,000, and 288,000 inhabitants. Saxony is essentially a mining and manufacturing country. The manufactures are the textile industries (linen, damask, muslin, hosiery, ribbons, cloth and buckskin, flannel, woollen goods, and waxcloth), the making of machinery, pottery, porcelain and glass, chemicals, beer, spirits, lace, paper, straw-plait, tobacco, artificial flowers, pianofortes, hats, toys, watches, books, musical instruments, ornamental wooden articles, &c. Coal, argentiferous lead, zinc, iron, and cobalt are produced; and Freiberg is one of the chief mineral centres in Germany. Amongst the recruits of 1887 there was only 1 in 5000 who could not read and write. Among educational institutions are the university and the conservatorium of Leipzig, famous schools at Meissen and Grimma, a polytechnic at Dresden, an industrial academy at Chemnitz, a mining academy at Freiberg, a forestry school at Tharandt. The annual national income and expenditure balance at about £22,700,000; the public debt, principally incurred for railways, amounted in 1913 to £43,500,000. The king exercises the supreme executive, and there are two legislative chambers. Saxony sends 23 members to the Reichstag of the empire, and 4 to the Bundesrat.

The old Saxons, a low-German people, once occupied all North Germany from the Rhine to the Elbe, from the Harz Mountains to the North Sea, and sent out warlike emigrants to found the English state. At home they had long wars with their kinsmen the Franks, and were not conquered and christianised (by Charlemagne) till 804. Duke Henry extended the Saxon dominion far east of the Elbe and over the present kingdom, subduing the Slavic tribes there. The Emperor Frederick I. (1180) confined the Saxon duchy to the country east of the Elbe; about 1360 the duke became an elector. In 1485 the reigning family split into two main branches, the electoral branch in the west, and the Albertine line beyond the Elbe. The Emperor Charles V. crushed the elector, conspicuous on the Protestant side, in 1547, and gave lands and title to the eastern branch. In the Thirty Years' War, the electors of Saxony (now the part containing the present kingdom) were driven to take the Protestant side, but becoming for a time kings of Poland, early in the 18th century returned (and have ever since remained attached) to Catholicism. Saxony sided with Austria in the Seven Years' War, and was severely handled by Frederick the Great. In 1806 the elector took the title of king and went over to the side of Napoleon, in consequence of which the Congress of Vienna took away from Saxony a large part of its dominions, and handed them over to Prussia (see SAXONY, PRUSSIAN). In the Franco-German war, the Saxons fought bravely by the side of the Prussians.

Saxony, PRUSSIAN, a province of Prussia, formed in 1815 out of districts taken from the kingdom of Saxony, part of the duchy of Magdeburg, the Altmark, the principalities of Halberstadt and Erfurt, &c. Anhalt (q.v.) almost divides it in two. Area, 9746 sq. m.; population, 3,000,000. The capital is Magdeburg; other towns are Halle, Erfurt, Halberstadt, Aschersleben, Mühlhausen, and Nordhausen.

Say. See NIGER.

Scafell (Skaw-fell'), a double-peaked mountain, the loftiest summit in England, on the Westmorland border of Cumberland, 14½ miles SSW. of Keswick. Of its two peaks, the higher, Scafell Pike, attains 3210 feet, the other 3161.

Scala Nova (Skâh'la Nova; Turkish Kuschadassi), a port of Asia Minor, at the head of a gulf, 40 miles S. of Smyrna, opposite Samos, and near the ruins of Ephesus (q.v.); pop. 7000.

Scalloway, a seaport village of Shetland, 6 miles WSW. of Lerwick; pop. 800.

Scalpa, an island of Harris, Inverness-shire, in East Loch Tarbert; area, 3 sq. m.; pop. 600.

Scalpay, an island off the E. coast of Skye, attains 994 feet; area, 10 sq. m.; pop. 30.

Scanderoon', or ALEXANDRETTA (Iskanderun, 'Alexander's town'), the port of Aleppo (77 miles SE.) on the Gulf of Scanderoon, in the NE. angle of the Levant, a poor and unhealthy place (pop. 10,000), with a neglected harbour, but a great transit trade, is a terminus of a branch of the Baghdad railway. It was founded by Alexander to commemorate his victory of Issus (333 B.C.). Off here Sir Kenelm Digby defeated a Franco-Venetian squadron (1628); and close by Mehemet Ali defeated the Turks in 1832.

Scandina'via, the peninsula comprising Sweden and Norway. Historically Scandinavia includes also Denmark and Iceland.

Scarba, an Argyllshire island, 1½ mile N. of Jura, attains 1500 feet. Area, 5¾ sq. m.

Scar'borough, the 'Queen of Watering-places,' in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 54 miles N. of Hull, 21 SSE. of Whitby, 43 NE. of York, and 233 N. of London. Backed by Oliver's Mount (500 feet), it rises like an amphitheatre round a beautiful sandy bay, protected on the north by a castle-crowned headland (300 feet), beyond which is the quieter North Cliff. The South Cliff and the old town (below the Castle) are separated by a picturesque gully, which is spanned by the Cliff Bridge (1827; 414 feet long, 75 high), and, farther up, by the Ramsdale Valley Bridge (1865). Scarborough (A.S. Skardeburge, 'fortified rock') is an old place, for Harold Hardrada ravaged it in 1066, and in 1181 it received a renewal of an earlier charter; it returned two members to parliament from Edward I.'s time till 1885, when the representation was reduced to one. The castle, now a shattered Norman keep, dates from 1136, but was rebuilt as a royal fortress by Henry II. Near it is St Mary's, the church originally of a Cistercian priory (1320), Transition Norman and Early English in style, with later additions. St Martin's (1862) is a good Early English structure, with windows by Morris. Other buildings are the splendid aquarium (1877), the museum (1828), the market-hall (1853), the huge Grand Hotel (1867), the new town-hall (1903), and the Spa (1880), the third on the site, whose two saline and chalybeate springs were discovered about 1620, and which has charming grounds. The tidal harbour, with a floating-dock, was formed between 1732 and 1850, and is enclosed by three piers, the longest and outermost curving 1380 feet; on the North Cliff are the Clarence Gardens (1890), and along the base is the Royal Albert Drive, which has been greatly extended round the castle promontory by the fine new Marine Drive. The season lasts from June till the middle of October, when visitors pour in by thousands. Lord Leighton was a native. The population is 37,200. See works by Gent (1735), Hinderwell (2d ed. 1811), J. Brogden Baker (1882), and Haviland (1883).

Scarpan'to, (anc. Karpathos), a long narrow mountainous island, attaining 4000 feet, midway between Rhodes and Crete; area, 85 sq. m.; pop. 5000 Greeks.

Scattery Island, an islet in the Shannon's estuary, 3 miles SW. of Kilrush, with a lighthouse, a fort, fragments of several small churches, and an ancient round tower 87 feet high.

Scawfell. See SCAFELL.

Schaffhausen (Shaff-how'zen), the most northern canton of Switzerland, is bounded on all sides but the south by Baden; area, 114 square miles; population, 46,000, German-speaking and Protestant. The Rhine forms the southern boundary; and the surface is hilly.—SCHAFFHAUSEN, the capital, is beautifully situated on the Rhine's right bank, 31 miles by rail WNW. of Constance. Overlooking the town, remarkable for its antique architecture, stands the castle of Munoth (1564–90), and there are also the cathedral (12th century), a concert hall, a library, a museum, and a statue to the historian Johannes von Müller, a native. Pop. 18,600. The grand falls of Schaffhausen, about 3 miles below the town, are utilised for factories, which turn out iron, arms, oil, flour, beer, spirits, soap, candles, wool, cotton, and agricultural machines.

Schässburg. See SEGESVÁR.

Schaumburg-Lippe (Showm'boorg-Lippeh), a sovereign German principality, lying between Westphalia and Hanover. Area, 131 sq. m.; population, 47,000, mostly Lutherans. Some coal is extracted. Capital, Bückeburg (pop. 5700).

Scheldt (Skelt; Fr. Escaut), a river that rises in the French dep. of Aisne, flows north past Cambrai and Valenciennes, and, entering Belgium, passes Tournai, Oudenarde, Ghent, Dendermonde, and Antwerp, receiving the Lys, Dender, and Rupel. Before it reaches the North Sea it is divided by the islands of Beveland (N. and S.) and Walcheren into two great arms, the Wester (on which is Flushing) and the Ooster Scheldt. The river is navigable to Cambrai, 211 miles from its mouth and 56 from its source.

Schellenberg (Shellenberg), a village 9 miles S. of Salzburg, where Marlborough defeated the Austrians in 1704.

Schemnitz (Shem'neetz; Magyar Selmeczbánya), the most famous mining-town of Hungary, in a mountain gorge, 65 miles N. by W. of Pesth. The mines have since Roman times produced gold and silver, copper and lead. Pop. 18,000.

Schenectady (Shenek'tady), a city of New York, on the Erie Canal and the south bank of the Mohawk River, 17 miles by rail NW. of Albany. It is the seat of Union University (1795), and contains locomotive works, stove-foundries, woollen and flour mills, &c. Schenectady was settled by the Dutch in 1661. Pop. 73,000.

Scheveningen (Skay'ven-ing-en), a Dutch seaside-resort on the North Sea, now practically part of the Hague, 2 miles NW. Pop. 26,000. Off Scheveningen the Dutch fleet was defeated, and its admiral Tromp killed, by the English under Monk on 8th–10th August 1653.

Schiedam (Skee-damm'), a Dutch town, 2¼ miles W. of Rotterdam, and close to the Maas; here Hollands gin is made, in diminishing quantity. It has a large shipping trade, cooperages, malt-kilns, &c. Pop. 32,500.

Schiehallion (Shee-hal'yon; Gael. 'maiden's pap'), an isolated Perthshire mountain (3547 feet), 11 miles WNW. of Aberfeldy. Here, in 1774, Maskelyne fixed the earth's mean density.

Schipka. See SHIPKA.

Schlangenbad (Shlang'en-bat), a German spa. The Rheingau stands in a wooded valley of the Taunus Mountains, 5 miles W. of Wiesbaden. The water of the baths (82°–90° F.) is used, for the most part externally, in baths, and is helpful in nervous diseases, for women's complaints, and for purifying the skin. Pop. 500. Visitors in the season, 2000. The place gets its name ('snakes' bath') from a harmless snake found there.

Schleswig. See SLESWICK.

Schlettstadt (Shlett'stat), a town of Lower Alsace, on the Ill's left bank, 27 miles by rail SSW. of Strasburg, manufacturing wire-gauze. In the 15th century, a free imperial city, it was the seat of a great humanist school. In 1634 the town became French; it was fortified by Vauban in 1676. The Germans, after capturing the town in 1870, razed the fortifications. Here Bucer the Reformer was born. Pop. 10,600.

Schlüsselburg (Schleess'elboorg), a town (pop. 6000) and prison-fortress of Russia, the fortress being on a rocky islet in the Neva where it issues from Lake Ladoga. Here Ivan VI. was murdered, after twenty-three years' imprisonment.

Schmalkalden (Shmahlkahl'den), an old town of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, 19 miles SW. of Gotha. The Protestant 'League of Schmalkald' was concluded here on 4th April 1531. Pop. 10,000.

Schneeberg (Shnay'berg), a mining-town of west Saxony, 20 miles SW. of Chemnitz, producing silver (though not in its former great abundance), cobalt, tin, and iron. Pop. 9000.

Schneekoppe (Shnay'kop-peh), the highest point (5260 feet) of the Riesengebirge (q.v.).

Schneidemühl, a Prussian town half-way between Berlin and Danzig, in a flat and dreary region in the north of Posen, with 26,000 inhabitants and some manufactures of iron, machines, starch, bone-dust, felt, and carpentry. An artesian well sunk here in 1893–94 poured forth such floods of water and mud as to inundate part of the town, and cause serious subsidences.

Schönebeck, a salt-making town of Prussia, 9 miles by rail S. of Magdeburg, on the Elbe's left bank; pop. 20,000.

Schöneberg, a town of Prussia, adjoining the SW. of Berlin; pop. 173,000.

Schönhausen (nearly Shaynhow'zen), a village of Prussian Saxony, 60 miles WNW. of Berlin by rail (pop. 2000), with the old seat of the Bismarck family, and the institute or hospital for secondary teachers and their widows and orphans, founded in 1885 by Prince Bismarck with the fund raised to celebrate his seventieth birthday.

Schoodic. See MAINE.

Schouwen (Skow'wen), an island of the Dutch province of Zealand, with an area of 62 sq. m. and a pop. of 25,000. Chief town, Zierikzee.

Schreckhorn, one of the mountains of the Bernese Oberland, SE. of Grindelwald; the highest peak (13,386 feet) was first ascended by Sir Leslie Stephen in 1861.

Schuylkill (Skoolkill), a river of Pennsylvania, rising in the coal region, and flowing 130 miles SE. to the Deleware at Philadelphia.

Schwalbach (Shval'bahh), or LANGENSCHWALBACH, a German spa, 8 miles W. by N. of Wiesbaden, has eight springs impregnated with iron and carbonic acid gas, efficacious in female complaints, poor blood, and muscular weakness. Pop. 3000, increased to 7000 in the season.

Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, a German principality, consists of the upper lordship (283 sq.

m.) in Thuringia, surrounded by the Saxon duchies of Weimar, Altenburg, and Meiningen; and the lower lordship (80 sq. m.), lying 40 miles to the N. in Prussian Saxony; pop. 100,000. Both divisions are mountainous; in the lower lordship stands the Kyffhäuser (1545 feet), under which, according to legend, Frederick Barbarossa sleeps. Capital, Rudolstadt.

Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, a German principality, consists of the lower lordship (200 sq. m.) in Prussian Saxony and two separate portions constituting the upper lordship (132 sq. m.) in the Thuringia, surrounded by the Saxon duchies of Gotha, Weimar, and Meiningen. Pop. 90,000. Capital, Sondershausen.

Schwarzwald (Shvartzvalt). See BLACK FOREST.

Schwedt (Shvayt), a town in the Prussian province of Brandenburg, on the Oder, 28 miles SSW. of Stettin, the residence of the margraves of Brandenburg from 1689 to 1788. Pop. 10,000.

Schweidnitz (Shvide'neetz), a town of Prussian Silesia, 36 miles by rail SW. of Breslau. Woollens and linens, implements, gloves, needles, pottery, beer, &c. are manufactured. Pop. 31,300.

Schweinfurt (Shvine'foort), long an imperial free city of NW. Bavaria, on the Main, 28 miles NE. of Würzburg by rail. Rückert the poet was born here (monument 1890). Pop. 22,200.

Schwerin (Shvay-reen'), capital of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, lies on the Lake of Schwerin (14 miles in length and 3 broad). It contains the grand-duke's castle (1845–58; partly burned in 1913), a Renaissance structure; the cathedral (1365–1430); an arsenal; a museum and picture-gallery; and manufactures of lacquered wares, machinery, cloth, &c. Pop. 42,500.

Schwyz (Shveets), a Swiss canton, touches in the north the Lake of Zurich, and in the west the Lakes of Zug and Lucerne. Area, 350 sq. m.; pop. 58,400, German-speaking and Catholics. The surface is mountainous, rising on the border to 9052 feet. The monastery of Einsiedeln attracts pilgrims, and the Rigi vast numbers of tourists in the summer. Schwyz, the capital, is picturesquely situated 26 miles by rail E. of Lucerne. Here, on 1st August 1891, was held the sixth centenary of the League of Brunnen and the seventh of the founding of Bern. Pop. 8000.

Sciacca (Shakka; anc. Thermæ Selinuntinæ), a seaport of S. Sicily, on a bold cliff 30 miles NW. of Girgenti, has a fine 11th-century cathedral, two ruined castles, and hot sulphurous and saline springs. Off the coast coral banks were discovered in 1875–80. Pop. 21,500.

Scicli (Shee'klee), a town in the SE. of Sicily, 36 miles SW. of Syracuse. Near by are the remains of the ancient Casmenæ. Pop. 15,000.

Scilly Islands (Silly), a Cornish group, lie about 27 miles WSW. of Land's End. They occupy, as a group, about 30 sq. m. of sea-room, and consist of six large islands—St Mary's (1528 acres; pop. 1400), Tresco (697 acres; pop. 300), St Martin's (515 acres; pop. 200), St Agnes (313 acres; pop. 100), Bryher (269 acres; pop. 100), and Samson (78 acres, uninhabited)—and some thirty small ones, besides innumerable rocks and ledges. None reaches more than 160 feet above the sea. They are wrongly identified with the Cassiterides or 'Tin Islands' of the ancients. The idea of a land of Lyonesse between the islands and the mainland submerged within historic times is now abandoned. The present name 'Scilly' belongs strictly to a small, very inaccessible, rocky island in the north-west, and is probably derived from Cornish silya, 'a conger eel.' Athelstan conquered the islands in 938, and established monks upon Tresco. The islands were handed over to Tavistock Abbey by Henry I., and in 1568 leased by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Francis Godolphin. In 1834 they were leased to Mr Augustus John Smith, who made Tresco his home for thirty-eight years, built churches and schools, suppressed smuggling, encouraged agriculture, and forbade overcrowded holdings. He was succeeded in 1872 by his nephew.

The climate is mild, but necessarily damp, and the weather is changeable and frequently stormy; but the temperature is extremely equable, averaging 58° F. in summer and 45° F. in winter. The leading natural features of the scenery are the fantastically weathered rocks and rock-basins and the bold coast-lines. There are remains of cromlechs and stone circles. There has been a lighthouse on St Agnes since 1680, on Bishop Rock since 1858, and on Round Island since 1887; there are also lights on the Wolf, the Seven Stones (floating), and the Longships of Land's End. Hugh Town, on St Mary's, is the only town on the islands; there is good anchorage in the roadstead. Wrecks used to be a fruitful source of wealth. One of the most famous was that of three ships of Sir Cloudesley Shovel's fleet in 1707, when 2000 men, including the admiral, were drowned. Smuggling was formerly largely indulged in. Kelp-making, introduced in 1684, has been given up; so, too, has shipbuilding. Nowadays most of the young men emigrate. Farming is practised, and early potatoes and broccoli are exported; but the chief industry now is the cultivation of narcissus and other lilies—100 tons of flowers being shipped in a single spring. See works by Borlase (1756), White (1850), Tonkin (Penzance, 1887), Besant (1890), and Wren (1907).

Scioto (Sī-o'to), a beautiful river of Ohio, flowing nearly 300 miles E. and S., to its junction at Portsmouth with the river Ohio.

Sclavonia. See SLAVONIA.

Scone (Scoon), in Perthshire, on the Tay's left bank, 2 miles N. of Perth, was the capital of Pictavia as early as 710, and the coronation place of the Scottish kings from 1153 till 1488, as afterwards in 1651 of Charles II. The 'Stone of Destiny' was carried off in 1296 by Edward I. An Augustinian abbey, founded by Alexander I. in 1115, was demolished by a rabble in 1559; and the subsequent Palace of the Viscounts Stormont, occupied by the Old Pretender for three weeks in 1716, and visited by Prince Charles Edward, gave place to a modern mansion, the seat of their descendant, the Earl of Mansfield. See Urquhart's History of Scone (1884).

Scotland, the northern part of Great Britain, is washed on the W. and N. by the Atlantic, on the E. by the North Sea, and on the S. is parted from England by the Solway Firth and the (largely artificial) line described in the article BORDERS Its length, from Cape Wrath to the Mull of Galloway, is 274 miles; its breadth varies between 24 and 146 miles; and its total area is 19,777,490 acres or 30,902 sq. m., of which 631 sq. m. are water. The geology, physical geography, meteorology, &c. have been sketched at GREAT BRITAIN. Of 787 islands, belonging mostly to the Hebrides, Orkneys, or Shetland, sixty-two exceed 3 sq. m. in area, and of these the largest are Long Island (Lewis and Harris, 859 sq. m.), Skye (643), the Mainland of Shetland (378), Mull (347), Islay (246), Pomona (207), Arran (168), Jura (143), and North Uist (136). Of twenty-six rivers flowing direct to the sea the chief are the Tweed (97 miles long), Forth (75), Tay (93), Dee (87), Don (82), Deveron (62), Spey (96), Clyde (106), and Nith (71); and of these the Forth, Tay, and Clyde expand into important estuaries. There is also the Moray Firth; and indeed the whole coast is so intersected by arms of the sea that few places are more than 40 miles inland. Fresh-water lakes are numerous—Lochs Lomond (27 sq. m.), Ness (19), Awe (16), Shin, Maree, Tay, Earn, Leven, Katrine, &c. The division into Highlands and Lowlands is explained at HIGHLANDS. In the Lowlands the highest points are Merrick (2764 feet) in Kirkcudbrightshire, and Broad Law (2723) in Peeblesshire; in the Highlands 184 summits exceed 3000 feet above sea-level—among them Ben Nevis (4406), Ben Macdhui (4296), Ben Lawers (4004), Ben Cruachan (3689), Ben Wyvis (3429), and Ben Lomond (3192). See CHEVIOTS, OCHILS, GRAMPIANS, &c. In the whole of Scotland the percentage of cultivated area is only 25·2—in Fife as high as 77·8, in Sutherland as low as 2·4. Woods cover less than 1400 sq. m.; and there are about 10,000 acres of orchards and land under small fruit. Between 1857 and 1913 horses increased from 185,406 to 204,441, cattle from 381,053 to 1,245,553, sheep from 5,683,168 to 6,798,801, pigs fell from 140,354 to 131,584. In 1912 the quantities of the principal minerals raised were, in tons: coal, 39,518,629 (7,448,000 in 1854); ironstone, 569,971; oil-shale, 3,184,826; fireclay, 678,945; igneous rocks and sandstone from quarries, 2,038,409. In 1905 there were in all Scotland about 750 textile factories, with some 2,500,000 spindles, 75,000 power-looms, and 170,000 hands. In shipbuilding there has been of late a minimum output of about 200 vessels of 115,000 tons yearly, a maximum of 500 of 600,000 tons; whilst at the same time foreign and colonial imports ranged between £27,000,000 and £40,000,000, the exports between £18,000,000 and £30,000,000. In 1911, at the thirty principal ports, there entered (including coastwise shipping) 56,224 sailing and steam vessels of 19,435,940 tons, and cleared 55,917 of 19,669,609 tons. The railways grew from 1243 miles in 1857 to 3815 in 1911. Pop. (1801) 1,608,420; (1821) 2,091,521; (1841) 2,620,184; (1861) 3,062,294; (1881) 3,735,573; (1911) 4,760,904, of whom 2,208,839 were males and 2,552,065 females, and 200,000 were Gaelic-speaking. Over 3,000,000 lived in burghs. In 1911 the twelve principal towns were Glasgow (pop., as extended in 1912, 1,008,487), Edinburgh (320,318), Dundee (165,004, or, as extended in 1913, when Broughty-Ferry was annexed, about 176,000), Aberdeen (163,891), Paisley (84,455), Leith (80,488), Greenock (75,140), Coatbridge (43,286), Motherwell (40,380), Kirkcaldy (39,601), Hamilton (38,644), Clydebank (37,548; the other towns with over 20,000 inhabitants are Perth, Kilmarnock, Falkirk, Ayr, Dunfermline, Wishaw, Airdrie, Rutherglen, Inverness, Dumbarton, Stirling, Arbroath; over 11,000 are Port-Glasgow, Hawick, Dumfries, Musselburgh, Buckhaven, Galashiels, Cowdenbeath, Peterhead, Renfrew, Johnstone, Kirkintilloch, Alloa, Barrhead, and Broughty-Ferry. Most Scotsmen adhere to the Presbyterian churches, but there are also Episcopalians, Independents, Baptists, Methodists, and some 400,000 Roman Catholics (most of them of Irish descent). The officers of state for Scotland are the Secretary for Scotland, the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, the Lord Clerk Register, the Lord Advocate, and the Lord Justice-clerk. The duties of the first, appointed under an Act of 1885 (amended 1887), were transferred to him from the Home Secretary, and relate to education, sanitation, manufactures, prisons, &c. Under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, many changes were made in the county boundaries, detached portions of Nairn, Perth, Selkirk, &c. being annexed to the counties surrounding them; whilst Orkney and Shetland, united for parliamentary purposes, were dissevered. There are thus thirty-three counties, whose area and population are shown in this table:

When the Romans extended their conquests (84 A.D.) to the Forth and Clyde, the country beyond, known to them as Caledonia, was occupied by the Picts, a Celtic people (perhaps partly by Celticised Iberians) speaking Gaelic, who called their country Alban or Albyn; while the south of what is now Scotland was possessed, like south Britain, by Cymric Celts, speaking a kind of Welsh. In the 5th century the Scots came from their home in Ireland into Argyllshire, and after centuries of war with the Picts, put the crown of Scots and Picts on the head of their king, Kenneth, in 843. The Scots, partially Christianised when they came, had Columba as their great missionary, and by means of him and his followers converted the Picts, the Cymri, and the northern tribes of the English, who since the 5th century had established themselves in the eastern parts of Britain as far north as the Forth. In the 10th century the country of the Picts and Scots came to be known by the name of Scotia (till then the name of Ireland), Nova Scotia, or Scotland; and it soon came to include all of what is now called Scotland, and for a time even Cumberland and Westmorland; Cymric Strathclyde became permanently Scottish in the 10th century, and in the same century and the beginning of the next, Lothian, the Merse, and Teviotdale, all heretofore part of Northumbria, all as English as any part of England, and more Anglian perhaps than any part of the south, were bestowed on the Scottish kings, The reign of Malcolm Canmore (1057–93) was a period of social, political, and religious revolution. Malcolm, long an exile in England, married Margaret, the sister of Edgar Atheling. Malcolm and his saintly queen (afterwards canonised) encouraged the introduction of English customs and civilisation, the English language, and English settlers; and began the process which led to the conforming of the stubborn Celtic Church to Roman usages. English (Anglo-Saxon) settlers established themselves in large numbers outside of the already purely English region in the south-east, which more and more became the headquarters of the kingdom; and the Anglo-Saxons were soon followed by many Normans, bringing with them a measure of French culture. David (1242–53) greatly promoted the well-being of church and state; and Scotland was a prosperous country till the death of Alexander III. (1286). Then the attempts of Edward I. of England to get Scotland incorporated by hook or crook with the rest of south Britain, led to the long, bloody, and destructive wars of independence, wars disastrous to all save national spirit and energy, and for 400 years Scotland, though free, was poor, barbarous, and torn by dissension. The Celtic element ventured, under the Lord of the Isles, to try conclusions with the Saxon lowlanders at Harlaw in 1411, but were signally worsted. Bannockburn (1314) encouraged the nation to resist to the uttermost the superior might of England; and not till after the Reformation (when Scotland adopted heartily the Presbyterian polity) were the crowns of England and Scotland united in the person of James VI. of Scotland, heir also to the English crown (1603). The Scots, enraged by the attempts of Charles I. to impose the Anglican ritual, fought stoutly with the English Parliament against the king, but enthusiastically supported the Restoration. Under Charles II. and James II. the National Church was depressed, and the Covenanters persecuted; and the Revolution was welcomed (1688) by the great bulk of the nation. The crowns had been conjoined by the personal tie of the sovereign in 1603; the kingdoms were united by legislative union in 1707 (the Scottish Church and Scots law being maintained intact), in spite of a good deal of Scottish discontent; and it was mainly the Highlanders who, in 1715 and 1745, rose in defence of the claims of the family of the exiled James II., under the old and the young Pretenders. From this time the history of Scotland may be regarded as merging in that of Britain, though Scotland and England, Scotsmen and Englishmen, are still in many respects very distinguishable. Scotsmen have taken a prominent part in the political and intellectual life of the United Kingdom, and done more than their share in building up the colonial empire of Great Britain.

Scotsbrig, a Dumfriesshire farm, 3 miles NE. of Ecclefechan, the home (1826) of the Carlyles.

Scrabster. See THURSO.

Scranton, a city of Pennsylvania, the capital of Lackawanna county, on the Lackawanna River, 144 miles by rail NW. of New York. It has a great trade in coal and mining supplies; and it has car and carriage factories, and large iron and steel manufactories, turning out locomotives, boilers, machinery, stoves, and edge-tools. Founded in 1840, it became a city in 1856. Pop. 130,000.

Scrivelsby. See HORNCASTLE, and a work by the Rev. S. Lodge (1893).

Scu′tari (Italian or Levantine form of the Turkish Zsküdar), a town of Asiatic Turkey, on the eastern shore of the Bosporus, opposite Constantinople, with mosques, bazaars, and baths, and a college of howling dervishes. It manufactures silks and cotton fabrics and leather goods, and has long been famed for its extensive cemeteries, adorned with magnificent cypresses. The pop. is variously estimated at from 40,000 to 60,000. During the Crimean war the barracks on the southern outskirts were occupied as barracks and hospital by the English troops, and formed the scene of Miss Nightingale's labours. Scutari occupies the site of the ancient Chrysopolis; and 2 miles S. lies the village of Kadiköi, the ancient Chalcedon.—(2) A town of Albania, at the S. end of the Lake of Scutari, 16 miles from the Adriatic. It was besieged and taken by the Montenegrins in 1912–13, and evacuated under pressure from the Powers. It is overlooked by an old Venetian citadel, manufactures arms and cotton goods, and trades in wool and skins. Pop. 30,000.

Seacombe, a NW. suburb of Birkenhead.

Seaford′, a watering-place of Sussex, 3 miles E. of Newhaven, a dependency of the Cinque Port of Hastings in the 15th century, was disfranchised in 1832. Of late it has grown. Pop. 4800.

Seaforth, LOCH, an arm of the sea, 14 miles long, in the east of the island of Lewis-with-Harris.

Seaham Harbour (See′am), a seaport of Durham, 6 miles S. of Sunderland. Founded in 1828 by the Marquis of Londonderry, it communicates by rail with neighbouring collieries, and has docks and quays for the shipment of coal. There are also bottle-works, blast-furnaces, an iron-foundry, chemical works, and a seamen's infirmary (1849). Pop. 16,000.

Sea Islands, a group of low sandy or marshy islands on the coast of South Carolina (q.v.), famed for their rice and fine cotton.

Sealkote. See SIALKOT.

Seathwaite. See BORROWDALE.

Seaton, a Devon watering-place, on a bay at the mouth of the Axe, 6½ miles SW. of Axminster; pop. 1700.

Seaton Carew, a Durham watering-place, part of West Hartlepool.

Seattle (Se-at′tel), capital of King county, Washington, on Elliott Bay, an arm of Puget Sound, 18 miles by rail N. of Tacoma. It owes its phenomenal growth to the lumber trade. Exports of grain and canned salmon are also very important. Seattle ranks next to San Francisco among the Pacific ports of the United States. Among 20th century harbour improvements is a canal connecting Puget Sound with the fresh-water Lake Union. Shipbuilding and a busy fishery are carried on. There is a university. In 1889 a terrible fire destroyed the whole business portion, and did damage estimated at nearly $10,000,000. Pop. (1880) 3533; (1890) 42,837; (1900) 80,671; (1910) 237,194.

Sebas'topol (Russian pron. Se-vas-top'ol), a Russian seaport and fortress, is situated on the site of an old Tartar village near the south-west extremity of the Crimea, on the southern side of one of the finest natural harbours in the world, 4½ miles long from east to west, and ½ mile across. The place is celebrated for its eleven months' siege by the allies during the Crimean war of 1854–55. It sustained repeated bombardments until the capture of the Malakoff and Redan works forced the Russians to evacuate the lines and retire to the north side. The town was completely ruined; the docks and forts still standing were blown up by French and English engineers, and by the treaty of Paris (1856) were not to be restored; but the restrictions were removed by the Conference of London (1871). Since 1885 the Russian government have restored fortifications and reconstructed the docks, mainly for the imperial navy. The sole export is grain, the chief imports cotton and coal. Pop. 65,000.

Sebenico (Seb-en-ee'ko; Slav. Sibenik), a picturesque town of Austrian Dalmatia, stands on a landlocked bay of the Adriatic, 43 miles by rail NW. of Spalato. The chief ornament of the place is its cathedral (1430–1555). Pop. 30,000.

Secunderábad. See Hyderabad.

Sedalia, capital of Pettis county, Missouri, 188 miles by rail W. of St Louis. It has large railway-shops, flour-mills, and manufactories of woollens, machinery and agricultural implements, wagons, furniture, and soap. Pop. 17,800.

Sedan (Fr. pron. Se-dong'), a frontier town of France, dep. Ardennes, stands on the Meuse, 64 miles by rail NE. of Rheims. Colbert founded here cloth-factories which are still busy; metal-working is carried on, and there is an active trade in wool. The population is about 20,000. The citadel capitulated to the Germans in 1815; but Sedan is chiefly noted for the surrender (September 2, 1870) of Napoleon III. and 83,000 men to the Germans. The fortress was dismantled after 1875. Marshals Turenne and Macdonald were born here. Previous to its incorporation with France (1642) Sedan was the capital of an independent principality and a Protestant stronghold. Its industrial prosperity was largely due to the influx of Huguenots; and at its theological seminary, famous until the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, notable Scotsmen such as Andrew Melville taught.

Sedbergh, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Rawthey, 32 miles NW. of Skipton. It has a Norman church and a grammar-school (1551) of high repute, where Sedgwick was educated and Hartley Coleridge was a master. Pop. of parish, 2400. See the Rev. W. Thompson, Sedbergh, Garsdale, and Dent (Leeds, 1892).

Sedgefield, a town of Durham, 9 miles NW. of Stockton, with a cruciform Early English church and a grammar-school. Pop. of parish, 3300.

Sedgemoor, a marshy district of Somerset, 5 miles SE. of Bridgwater, scene of Monmouth's defeat, 1685.

Sedgley, a town of Staffordshire, 3 miles S. of Wolverhampton; pop. 16,500.

Seeland (Dan. Själland). See Zealand.

Séez (Say-ess'), a French cathedral city in the dep. of Orne, 13 m. NNE. of Alençon; pop. 4000.

Sefton, a Lancashire parish, 6 miles N. of Liverpool, with the Liverpool race-course.

Seges'ta, an ancient city of NW. Sicily, of which a great Doric temple survives.

Segesvár (g hard; Ger. Schässburg), a town of Transylvania, on the Great Kokel, 60 miles by rail NE. of Hermannstadt; pop. 12,000.

Seghill, a Northumberland town, 6½ miles NNE. of Newcastle; pop. 2000.

Sego'via, an old city of Spain, at the northern foot of the Sierra de Guadarrama, 32 miles NNW. of Madrid. It occupies a rocky eminence 3300 feet above sea-level, is surrounded by ruinous walls with round towers, and consists of narrow uneven streets, with quaint old stately houses. The Moorish castle on the rocky height has been restored since its destruction by fire in 1862; it lodged our Charles I. in September 1623. The cathedral (1521–77) is one of the finest specimens of Late Gothic in Spain. The grand Roman aqueduct, built in Trajan's time, consists of two rows of arches, the one resting upon the other, some 2600 feet long and 102 feet high. Pop. 16,000. Segovia was a place of importance under the Romans, and was a frequent residence of the kings of Castile and Leon. The unresisting town was sacked in 1808 by the French.—Area of province of Segovia, 2600 sq. m.; pop. 168,000.

Segu, or Segu-Sikoro, an important trading-town of western Africa, stands on the Niger (here called the Joliba), 400 miles SW. of Timbuctoo; once the capital of a large native state, now French (1890); pop. 36,000. See Gravier, Voyage à Segu (1887).

Seil, an Argyllshire island, 4 miles SE. of Mull, attains over 800 feet; area, 6 sq. m.; pop. 560.

Seine (Sayn or Sehn), one of the four chief rivers of France, rises on the slope of the plateau of Langres, north-west of Dijon, and winds 482 miles NW., past Troyes, Fontainebleau, Melun, Paris, St Denis, St Germain, Mantes, Elbeuf, and Rouen, till it falls into the English Channel by a wide estuary, on which stand the ports of Harfleur, Havre, and Honfleur. It is navigable for boats from Marcilly, 350 miles from its mouth, and since 1890 the canalisation of the Seine has been one of two projects (the other a ship-canal) for connecting Paris with the Atlantic. The Seine receives the Aube, Marne, and Oise from the right, and the Yonne, Loing, Essonne, and Eure from the left; and is connected by canals with the Somme, Scheldt, Meuse, Rhine, Saône, and Loire. Works for keeping open a navigable channel through the estuary, which is liable to silt up, were carried out in 1848–70; by these much land has been reclaimed, and vessels drawing 20 feet can get up to Rouen. A canal connects Havre with the Seine at Tancarville. There were disastrous floods in 1910.

Seine, the metropolitan dep. of France, completely enclosed by the dep. of Seine-et-Oise, is a portion of the former province of Île-de-France. One-sixth of its area is covered by the city of Paris (q.v.), and the rest is thickly studded with the suburban villages of the capital—Boulogne, Puteaux, Clichy, Montreuil, &c. It is at once the smallest and the most populous dep. in the republic: its area is 185 sq. m.; its pop. in 1876 was 2,410,849, and in 1911, 4,154,042. The arrondissements are Paris, St Denis, and Sceaux.

Seine-et-Marne (Sehn-ay-Marn), a dep. in the north of France, is bounded on the W. by the dep. of Seine-et-Oise, and forms a portion of that wide basin in the middle of which stands Paris. Area, 2274 sq. m.; pop. (1911) 363,561. The arrondissements are Melun (the capital), Coulommiers, Fontainebleau, Meaux, and Provins.

Seine-et-Oise (Sehn-ay-Wâhz), a dep. in the north of France, encloses the dep. of Seine; area, 2200 sq. m.; pop. (1911) 817,617. Arrondissements: Versailles (the capital), Corbeil, Étampes, Mantes, Pontoise, and Rambouillet.

Seine-Inférieure (Sehn-An^{g}fayriehr'), a maritime dep. of northern France, part of Normandy, and bounded N. and W. by the English Channel; area, 2500 sq. m.; pop. (1911) 877,383. The arrondissements are Dieppe, Havre, Rouen (the capital), Neufchâtel, and Yvetot.

Seir, Mount. See Edom.

Seistan, Sistan, or Hamoon, Lake, a large shallow lake or swamp in the west of Afghanistan, close to the Persian frontier, a division of whose province of Khorassan (mainly steppe) is named Seistan after it. The lake is divided into three depressions. Much of the area is generally dry.

Sekondi, a port of the Gold Coast (q.v.).

Selángor, one of the Federated Malay States, since 1874 under British protection. It lies between Malacca and Perak, and has an area of 3000 sq. m. and a population of 294,000, including many Chinese. It is rich in tin. The capital, Kwala Lampur, is connected by rail (27 miles) with the port of Klang and Port Swettenham.

Selborne, a pleasant Hampshire parish of 12 sq. m. and 2000 inhabitants, 5 miles SSE. of Alton station and 20 E. of Winchester. Gilbert White (1720–93) has made it for ever famous by his Natural History of Selborne (1789). 'The Wakes,' the ivied house where he was born and died, still stands, though added to; the church, where he lies, was restored in 1877. Nothing remains of an Augustinian priory (1232).

Selby, a market-town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the right bank of the Ouse, 15 miles S. of York and 20 E. of Leeds. The great cruciform parish church, measuring 283 by 59 feet, was the church of a mitred Benedictine abbey, founded in the 12th century. It exhibits every style from Norman to Perpendicular; lost its south transept by the fall in 1690 of the central tower (meanly rebuilt twelve years later); and gutted by fire, was repaired in 1906–9. Other edifices are a Roman Catholic church (1859), St James's Church (1868), and a modern market-cross. The river is navigable for vessels of 200 tons; and there is a carrying trade by railway and canal. Selby has manufactures of flax, ropes, leather, beer, &c., besides boat-building and brick-making. It is the traditional birthplace of Henry I. (1068), and in the Great Rebellion was recaptured from the royalists by Fairfax (1644). Pop. 9000. See W. W. Morrell's History of Selby (1867).

Selenga, a river (740 miles) of Mongolia and Siberia, flowing by three arms into Lake Baikal. It is navigable in summer for 200 miles from the Mongolian frontier, and steamers ply on it.

Selen'cia, the name of several ancient cities in Syria, Pisidia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, Caria, and Mesopotamia, founded under the Seleucid kings.

Seli'nus, an ancient Greek colony of Sicily, now represented by ruins close to the modern Castelvetrano (q.v.).

Selkirk, a Scottish royal burgh, the county town of Selkirkshire, on an eminence 400 to 619 feet above sea-level, that flanks the right bank of Ettrick Water, 6¼ miles S. by W. of Galashiels by a branch-line (1856) and 40 SSE. of Edinburgh. The county buildings (1870), the town-hall (1803), with a spire 110 feet high, and the statues of Scott (1839) and Mungo Park (1859) are the chief features of the place, with the beautiful grounds of the Haining House. The 'souters of Selkirk' were long famous for their 'single-soled shoon;' but to-day the staple manufacture is that of tweeds, which dates from 1835. With Hawick and Galashiels, Selkirk returns one member since 1868. Pop. (1831) 1880; (1861) 3695; (1911) 5946. About 1113 Earl David founded at Schelechyrch ('kirk of the shiels') a Tironensian abbey, which as David I. he removed about 1126 to Kelso (q.v.). Mr Andrew Lang was a native.

Selkirk Mountains, an outlying range of the Rocky Mountains, in British Columbia, extending southwards from about 52° N. lat. to near the United States frontier. The Canadian Pacific Railway climbs over the mountains at a point 4300 feet above the sea. See W. S. Green, Among the Selkirk Glaciers (1890).

Selkirkshire, an inland county in the south of Scotland, bounded by Peebles, Edinburgh, Roxburgh, and Dumfries shires. Measuring 28 miles by 17, it has an area of 267 sq. m. or 170,793 acres, of which barely one-seventh is under crops. Silurian in formation, and drained by Ettrick and Yarrow Waters to the Tweed, it is a pastoral region of grassy rounded hills—Minchmoor (1856 feet), Dun Rig (2433, the highest), Ettrick Pen (2269), and eight others exceeding 2000 feet above sea-level. Sheep-farming (over 160,000 head) is an important industry; and the manufactures are confined to the two towns of Selkirk and Galashiels. The Duke of Buccleuch owns about three-fifths of the whole county. Since 1867 Selkirkshire has united with Peeblesshire to return one member. Pop. (1801) 5388; (1851) 9809; (1871) 14,005; (1911) 24,601. Smaller than Middlesex, and than all but six of the thirty-three Scotch counties, Selkirkshire yet contains within its narrow bounds almost all the old Forest of Ettrick; St Mary's Loch; the whole course of the Yarrow; the vale of Ettrick, where the 'Shepherd' was born and lies buried; the birthplaces, too, of Laidlaw and Mungo Park, of the 'Flower of Yarrow' and Alison Cockburn; Ashiesteel, where Scott wrote Marmion; the scenes of the ballads of 'The Douglas Tragedy,' 'The Dowie Dens,' 'The Outlaw Murray,' and 'Young Tamlane;' the battlefield of Philiphaugh; and the ruins or sites of the castles and peel-towers of Newark, Dryhope, Tushielaw, Oakwood, and Buccleuch. See works by Craig-Brown (2 vols. 1886), Angus (1894), and Sir G. Douglas (1899).

Selma, capital of Dallas county, Alabama, on the Alabama River, 165 miles by rail NNE. of Mobile. It has ironworks, cotton-factories, steam planing-mills, car-works, &c. Pop. 14,000.

Selsey, or Selsea, a village on a flat and fertile peninsula on the Sussex coast, 7 miles S. of Chichester. Here in the 7th century the cathedral church of the South Saxons was founded by Wilfrid of York; and twenty-two bishops held the see, ere in 1079 the bishopric was transferred to Chichester. The sea has greatly encroached on the peninsula, which ends in Selsey Bill; the site of the cathedral is now submerged. Pop. of parish, 1500.

Selters, a village, 8 miles SE. by rail of Limburg in Nassau. Its springs supply the mineral waters called in England seltzer water.

Semendria, a fortress of Servia, on the Danube's right bank, 26 miles SE. of Belgrade. Pop. 7000.

Semipalatinsk', a province of Asiatic Russia, stretching northwards from Lake Balkash. It embraces outliers of the great Altai, rising to 10,000 feet, and enclosing wide stretches of steppe-land. Area, 180,000 sq. m.; pop. 850,000, mostly Kirghiz. The chief town, Semipalatinsk, is on the right bank of the Irtish; pop. 32,000.

Semiretchinsk', a province of Asiatic Russia, having East Turkestan on the SE., and Lake Balkash on the N., is a mountainous region, being crossed from east to west by the Ala-tau and Thian-Shan Mountains, whose peaks run up to 16,000 feet. Between them lies the mountain-lake of Issyk-kul. Area, 145,000 sq. m.; pop. 1,200,000. Vyernyi (pop. 32,600) is the chief town.

Semliki (Sem-lee'kee), a river of equatorial Africa, flowing NE. to Albert Nyanza.

Semlin (Hung. Zimony), a frontier town of Slavonia, stands on a tongue of land at the junction of the Save and the Danube, above Belgrade. It contains the ruined castle of John Hunyady, who died here. Pop. 16,000.

Sem'mering, a mountain (4577 feet) on the borders of Styria and Austria, 60 miles SW. of Vienna, over which the Trieste Railway was constructed in 1850–53 at a cost of £2,000,000.

Sempach (Zem'pahh), a small Swiss town (pop. 3000), 9 miles by rail NW. of Lucerne, on the east shore of the lake of Sempach. Under its walls Leopold of Austria, with 4000 men, was routed on 9th July 1386 by 1500 Swiss.

Sempringham, a Lincolnshire parish, 13 miles E. by S. of Grantham. St Gilbert (1083–1189) was probably a native.

Semple. See LOCHWINNOCH.

Senaar. See SENNAAR.

Sendai, a coast-town of Japan, 220 miles NNE. of Tokyo by rail. Pop. 100,000.

Sen'eca Falls, a post-village of New York, on the Seneca River (which falls 50 feet here), 10 miles from the lake and 41 by rail WSW. of Syracuse, with manufactories of steam fire-engines, pumps, &c. Pop. 6600.

Sen'eca Lake, one of a range of narrow lakes in the west of New York State, 36 miles N. and S., two miles in average width, and 530 feet deep.

Seneffe', or SENEF, a Belgian town (pop. 4000), 27 miles S. by W. of Brussels. Here William of Orange (III. of England) was defeated by Condé in 1674, and in 1794 the Austrians by the French.

Senegal (Sen-e-gawl'), a river of West Africa, has two main sources, the Bafing from Futa-Jallon, and the Bakhoy from the SE., which meet at Bafulabé, 700 miles from the coast; thence the united Senegal flows to the Atlantic 10 miles below St Louis. In July–October, boats can get up to Kayes, 40 miles below Bafulabé. The channel is in the higher reaches obstructed by falls and narrows, its lower course is studded with low, flat islands, and its mouth blocked by a formidable bar. There is a railway along the left bank between Kayes and Dioubéba (25 miles beyond Bafulabé), continued to Bammako and Kulikoro on the Niger, so that Timbuktu is connected with Europe by rail and steamer. For the French colonies of SENEGAL and UPPER SENEGAL-NIGER, see next article.

Senegambia is a general name for the region drained by the rivers Senegal and Gambia, from whose names the word is compounded. In a wider sense it is applied unofficially to French West Africa, especially to those possessions which lie north of French Guinea, the Ivory Coast, and Dahomey. The French first settled in this part of Africa early in the 17th century, became active after 1854, greatly extended their influence after 1880. They pushed fast enough down the Niger to cut off the hinterland of the British and German colonies, and in 1890 their title to the country as far east as Lake Chad was recognised. Since 1906 the country under the governor-general of West Africa has consisted of the three colonies already named, with Senegal and Upper Senegal-Niger, to which Mauritania was added in 1909. The colony of Senegal consists of the municipal communes of St Louis (the capital; q.v.), Dakar (a naval station, capital of French West Africa), Rufisque, and Gorée, whose inhabitants elect the conseil-général of Senegal and a deputy to the French Chamber; of certain directly administered territories; and of native states under French protection. Senegal includes the country west of the Faleme and south of the Senegal, to which the right bank was added in 1909. It has an area of 74,000 sq. m., and a population estimated at 1,200,000. The region to the north is Mauritania, a protectorate (350,000 sq. m.; pop. 600,000, mostly Moors). From the Faleme to Lake Chad stretches the colony of Upper Senegal-Niger (840,000 sq. m.; pop. 5,500,000), formed in 1904 out of the former protected territories of Senegambia and of the Niger, the Senegal protectorate being restored to Senegal. Of the former Military Territories, those of Timbuktu and Zinder-Chad were united as the Military Territory of the Niger, and the remainder of the country placed under civil administration, the capital being Bamako. Railways connect Dakar with St Louis and with Kayes, and Kayes with the Niger. Steamers ply regularly on the Niger and the Senegal. French Guinea, formerly called Rivières du Sud, includes the coast between Portuguese Guinea and Sierre Leone, with a considerable inland region north of Liberia. From the capital, Konakry, or Conacry, a seaport, a railway runs to Kurussa on the Niger. Area, 100,000 sq. m.; pop. 1,500,000 to 2,500,000. For DAHOMEY and IVORY COAST, see separate articles. The people are mostly Fulah and Mandingo Negroes, in part Moslems, in part fetich-worshippers. The principal geographical feature in these united regions is the plateau (2000 to 4000 feet) of Futa-Jallon (q.v.); from its valleys issue many rivers that flow (e.g. the Gambia) west and south-west to the Atlantic, north to the Senegal, and east and north-east to the Joliba (Niger). Ground-nuts, gums, india-rubber, timber, &c. constitute the bulk of the exports—three-fourths to France. See also SAHARA.

Senlac. See BATTLE.

Senlis (Son^{g}leece'), a very ancient town of France, dep. of Oise, 33 miles NNE. of Paris. It has walls flanked with towers, partly Roman; the ruins of a royal castle; and a small but beautiful cathedral (begun 1155). Senlis ceased to be a bishop's seat in 1801. Pop. 7000.

Sennaar, Sennar, or Senaar, a city of Anglo-Egyptian Soudan, on the Blue Nile, 160 miles SSE. of Khartoum; pop. 8000. It is the chief town of a district lying between the Blue and the White Nile, an old kingdom, now a province.

Sennen, a Cornish village, Land's End.

Sens (Son^{g}), an old walled town of France, dep. Yonne, stands on the right bank of the Yonne, 70 miles by rail SE. of Paris. Its principal ornament is the Gothic cathedral of St Stephen (1122–68), with splendid portals, fine stained glass, and the vestments of Thomas à Becket. Pop. 13,000.

Sentis. See Säntis.

Seoni (Se-o'nee), a town in the Central Provinces of India, half-way between Nagpur and Jabalpur. Pop. 12,000.—There is another Seoni (pop. 8000) 35 miles SW. of Hoshangabad.

Seoul, or Söul (Sowl), the capital of Corea, stands on the river Han, 75 miles from its entrance into the Yellow Sea and 57 miles from its port Chemulpo. It was the objective of the armies of Japan and China in the war of 1894. Pop. 200,000, or, with extensive suburbs, 300,000. See Curzon's Problems of the Far East (1894).

Seraïevo. See Sarajevo.

Seraing (Seran$^{g'}$), a town of Belgium, 4 miles by rail SW. of Liége, stands on the right bank of the Meuse, and is connected by a suspension bridge with the village of Jemeppe. It is the seat of a colossal manufactory of steam-machinery, locomotives, &c., established by an Englishman, John Cockerill (1790–1840), in 1817 in the old summer palace of the bishops of Liége. It employs some 12,000 work-people in hundreds of machine-shops, forges, coal-mines, &c. Pop. (1827) 2000; now over 43,000.

Serajgunj. See Sirajganj.

Serampur', a town of India, built in European style, along the right bank of the Hooghly, 13 miles by rail N. of Calcutta. A Danish settlement till 1845, it was the centre of the Baptist mission. Pop. 46,000.

Serang. See Ceram.

Seres, in Greece, 43 miles NE. of Salonica, trades in wool, skins, and tobacco; pop. 30,000.

Sereth, a river running nearly 300 miles S. through Moldavia to the Danube.

Sergipe (Ser-zhee'peh), a maritime state of Brazil, NE. of Bahia; area, 10,000 sq. m.; population, 500,000.—There is a small town, Sergipe or São Christovão, on the Sergipe River; but the capital is the port of Aracajú; pop. 32,000.

Serinagar. See Srinagar.

Seringapatam' (properly Sri Ranga Patanam = 'City of Vishnu'), the capital of Mysore state in Southern India from 1610 to 1799, is built on an island in the Kaveri, 10 miles NE. of Mysore city. The island is 3 miles long and 1 broad; at its western end stands the fort enclosing the palace of Tippoo Saib and the principal mosque. Outside it are the garden in which was built the mausoleum of Tippoo and his father, Hyder Ali, and Tippoo's summer palace. The fort was besieged by Lord Cornwallis in 1791, and again in 1792. A British army appeared before the walls again in 1799, and on 3d May the fort was stormed and Tippoo slain. Pop. 150,000 in Tippoo's day; now only 10,000, most of whom live in the suburb of Ganjam, the ancient city being ruinous.

Seringham (Srírangam), a town in the Madras Presidency, on an island in the Kaveri, 11 miles W. of Trichinopoly, with a great temple of Vishnu, a vast complex of halls and colossal gateways. Notable is one 'hall of 1000 columns' (960 really), 450 feet long by 130 wide. Pop. 34,000.

Serpukoff, a Russian town, 57 miles by rail S. of Moscow, with a cathedral (1380), manufacturing cottons, woollens, leather, &c.; pop. 30,000.

Servia, a kingdom of the Balkan Peninsula, south of the Danube, and bordering on Bosnia, Hungary, Roumania, Bulgaria, Greece, Albania, and Montenegro. The area, formerly about 18,700 sq. m., was almost doubled by the wars of 1912–13. The surface is mountainous; the highest peaks occur in the frontier chains; and there are many isolated peaks and groups, clothed with forests and parted by fertile valleys. The principal highway of the country is through the central valleys of the Morava and Vardar, stretching SSE. from the Danube. Servia is essentially an agricultural country. The principal crops are wheat, maize, and other cereals, and grapes for wine. Plums are dried and exported to a value between £250,000 and £700,000 a year, and from them the Servian brandy is made. Large herds of swine are fed on the acorns of the oak forests, and then driven into Hungary to be sold. Cattle and sheep are exported, also wheat and other cereals, hides, wine, wool, timber, and cordage. The total exports for the five years ending 1911 averaged about £3,700,000 annually. The imports consist principally of cottons, woollens, salt, timber, iron, steel, and other metals, hides, sugar, coffee, glass, paper, tobacco, machinery, &c., and range from £1,500,000 to over £4,400,000. And there is a rapidly growing transit trade. By far the greater portion of the foreign trade of Servia is in the hands of Austria-Hungary, and is concentrated at Belgrade, the capital. But some is done by Nisch and other towns of central and southern Servia, by rail through Salonica (q.v.). The manufacturing industry is still in its infancy, but clothing and carpets are made by the women in their own homes. The country is naturally rich in minerals, and a little coal, lignite, quicksilver, lead, silver, antimony, copper, and oil-shale is mined. Belgrade is the capital. Along the valley of the Morava passes the railway from Vienna to Constantinople; from Nisch or Nissa, on this line, runs another (1889) to Salonica.

The Servians are a well-built, stalwart Slavonic (or perhaps in part Slavonised Albanian) race, proud and martial by temperament; the most striking feature of their social life is the family community or Zadruga. Their literature is rich in poetry, especially lyrics. The population, about 3,000,000 at the outbreak of the war of 1912–13, was raised by conquests to about 5,000,000. Besides these the Montenegrins (450,000) are almost all pure Servians by race, as are also the Bosnians and Herzegovinians (2,000,000), not to speak of over 3,700,000 Servians in other parts of Austria-Hungary. The people of Servia belong to the Greek Catholic Church. There are 1300 elementary schools, some technical and theological schools, and a university (1000 students) at Belgrade. The legislative power is vested in the king and the National Assembly or Skupshtina. Besides this body and the ministry, there is a senate of sixteen members, elected by the king and the Skupshtina, which acts as a permanent state council. The national income in 1911 was £4,800,000, and nearly balanced the expenditure; the debt is over £26,000,000. There is a standing army (with universal military service) of 30,000, and a war strength of 400,000.

The Servians came from the Carpathians in the 7th century, and founded a great state, which about 1350 embraced Albania and much of Bulgaria and Macedonia; but at Kossovo in 1389 the Turks crushed the Servian power, and made Servia first tributary and then a pashalik of the Ottoman empire. A national rising had some success under Kara George in 1807–10, and through Russian influence it was arranged that Servia should have some measure of internal autonomy. Still more successful was a rising in 1815 under Obrenovich. Under his successors there was considerable progress; and after the Russo-Turkish war of 1877–78, Servia obtained complete independence, and became a kingdom. King Milan abdicated in 1889. In 1903 a party of officers, representing a wide conspiracy, assassinated King Alexander and Queen Draga, and Peter Karageorgevitch was proclaimed king. In 1912–13 Servia, with Greece, Bulgaria, and Montenegro, made war on Turkey, and in 1913 with the other allies and Roumania against Bulgaria. Disappointed in her hope of a seaport, she obtained a great southward extension of territory.

Sessa, 32 miles NW. of Naples, has a fine cathedral and ruins. Pop. 20,000.

Sestos. See Abydos.

Sestri Ponente, a suburb of Genoa.

Setif, capital of a department of Algeria, 70 miles west of Constantine. Pop. 26,000.

Settle, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Ribble, and at the base of the Castlebergh cliff (300 feet), 43 miles NW. of Leeds. Dr Birkbeck was a native. Pop. of parish, 2600.

Setu′bal (called by English sailors St Ubes), a seaport of Portugal, on the N. side of the Bay of Setubal, 17 miles by rail SE. of Lisbon. Setubal is the old Roman Cetobriga. Pop. 25,000.

Sevastopol. See Sebastopol.

Sevenoaks (Sen′oaks), a pleasant town of Kent, on an eminence 22 miles SE. of London. It has a Perpendicular church with some interesting monuments, the Walthamstow Hall (1882) for 100 daughters of missionaries, and a grammar-school founded in 1432 by Lord Mayor Sir W. Sennocke, incorporated by Queen Elizabeth, and reconstituted as a first-grade modern school in 1877, at which Grote and Bishops Christopher and Charles Wordsworth were educated. Knole, the magnificent seat of Lord Sackville, is close by. It was mainly built between 1460 and 1608 by Archbishop Bourchier and Thomas Sackville, first Earl of Dorset, and has a park of 1000 acres. Pop. 24,000.

Severn (Lat. Sabrina), after the Thames, the largest of the rivers of England, rises, 1500 feet above sea-level, from a chalybeate spring on the eastern side of Plinlimmon, 12 miles west of Llanidloes, in Montgomeryshire, North Wales. Flowing eastward to Llanidloes, to which town it retains its original British name of Hafren, it afterwards flows north-east past Newtown (465 feet) and Welshpool to the eastern boundary of Montgomeryshire, then east-south-east past Shrewsbury and Bridgnorth in Salop, and finally southward through Worcester and Gloucester, in which last it begins to form the estuary that merges in the Bristol Channel (q.v.). It is navigable for barges to Welshpool (180 miles). Its entire length is 210 miles (from source to mouth as the crow flies only 80). The chief affluents are the Terne and the Upper and Lower Avon on the east, and the Teme and Wye on the west. A canal 18½ miles long, and navigable for vessels of 350 tons, extends from Gloucester to the upper portion of the estuary; and in 1891 the improvement of the navigation to Worcester was begun. The Montgomery Canal extends from Welshpool to Newtown, and other canals connect with the Thames, Trent, Mersey, &c. In some of the reaches below Gloucester, especially near Newnham, the tide, which flows with great velocity, produces a bore (locally termed hygre) or wave sometimes 5 or 6 feet high. The railway twice crosses the estuary—near Berkeley by a viaduct (1879), 1194 yards long, and near Chepstow by a tunnel (1873–85), 4⅓ miles long.

Severo, Cape. See Chelyuskin.

Sev′ille′ (Span. Sevilla; pron. Seveel′ya), one of the most famous of Spanish cities, stands on the left bank of the navigable Guadalquivir, 62 miles (95 by rail) N. by E. of Cadiz, and is connected with a large suburb (Triana) on the right bank by an iron bridge (1848). Until quite recently it had the appearance of a picturesque Moorish town; but during the last few years it has been greatly modernised by the clearing away of the narrower quarters to make room for wide straight streets and modern houses and shops. The water-supply was formerly brought from Alcalá de los Panaderos by an old Roman aqueduct of 410 arches, but this has been superseded by new water-works constructed by Englishmen in 1883. The vast Gothic cathedral, built in 1401–1519 on the site of a Moorish mosque, is one of the largest in Europe, and contains valuable paintings by Murillo (a native of Seville) and other masters; magnificent Flemish stained glass of the 16th century; one of the largest organs in the world; the tombs of King Ferdinand III. and Ferdinand the son of Columbus; and much most excellent artistic work in bronze, wood-carving, and sculptured work. Close beside it stands the beautiful campanile called Giralda, 275 feet high. Both cathedral and tower were seriously damaged by an earthquake in 1884. Another of the glories of Seville is the Alcazar, or Moorish royal palace, begun in the end of the 12th century, enlarged and beautified by Peter the Cruel; its halls and gardens are surpassed only by those of the Alhambra. Amongst other places must be mentioned the so-called House of Pilate; the museum, with masterpieces by Murillo, Zurbaran, and other artists of the Seville school, as well as by Velasquez (also a native of Seville); the charity hospital; the exchange (1585), sheltering the valuable archives of the Americas; the university (1254; rebuilt 1567); the palace (1697) of the archbishop; the Palace of San Telmo, founded as a naval college by Columbus' son, but now a palace of the Duke of Montpensier; and the bull-ring for 18,000 spectators. There are manufactures of cigars (a royal factory employing 6000 work-people), iron, machinery, pottery, cannon, silks, cottons, &c. The imports consist principally of chemicals, timber, textiles, petroleum, machinery, coal, metals, spirits, fish, haberdashery, tinplate, and furniture; the exports of lead, quicksilver, wine, copper, oranges, olives, and olive-oil and corks. Pop. (1878) 133,938; (1910) 155,366. The Roman Hispalis, and from 712 to 1248 the Ishbilia of the Moors, Seville was then captured by Ferdinand III. of Castile, and 300,000 Moors abandoned the place.—Area of province, 5428 sq. m.; pop. 587,000.

Sèvres (Sehvr), a town of France, dep. Seine-et-Oise, 10½ miles SW. of Paris, has since 1756 been celebrated for its state factory of artistic porcelain. The Sèvres vases are of great value and are known the world over; painted glass and mosaic are also made. Pop. 8000.

Sèvres, Deux- (Duh-Sehvr), a dep. in the west of France, formed chiefly out of the ancient province of Poitou; area, 2300 sq. m.; pop. (1911) 337,627. The arrondissements are Niort (the capital), Bressuire, Melle, and Parthenay.

Seychelles (Say-shell'), a group of British islands, formerly dependent on Mauritius, but since 1888 with a separate administration, in the Indian Ocean, 600 miles NE. of Madagascar. There are thirty larger islands and numerous smaller ones, their total area being 148 sq. m.; the largest and most important is Mahé (17 miles by 7). They were colonised by the French in 1742, though they were known to the early Portuguese navigators. The British wrested them from the French in 1794, and they were finally ceded in 1814. The islands are mountainous, and in Mahé reach close upon 3000 feet. Coral-reefs grow round most of the islands. The climate, though tropical (70° to 93° F.), is very healthy. The soil is fertile and vegetation luxuriant. The principal products are the fibre, nuts, and oil of the cocoa-nut palm; but coco-de-mer, maize, manioc, tobacco, coffee, vanilla, cloves, tortoiseshell, soap, and vacoa bags are exported. The imports consist chiefly of cotton, haberdashery, coal, spirits and wine, and provisions. Victoria, the chief town on Mahé, is a coaling station. Pop. of the islands, 26,000—negroes, coolies, and French creoles.

Seymour, a city of Indiana, 88 miles by rail W. of Cincinnati; pop. 6300.

Seyne, La (Sayn), a seaport of France (dep. Var), on the Mediterranean, 3 miles SW. of Toulon, with shipbuilding yards; pop. 20,000.

Sezze (Set'zeh ; anc. Setia), a cathedral city of Italy, 40 miles SE. of Rome, has ruins of a temple to Saturn, amphitheatre, &c.; pop. 10,000.

Sfax, the second port of Tunis, on the Gulf of Cabes, 150 miles S. by E. of the town of Tunis. It trades in dates, olive-oil, esparto-grass, wool, fruits, sponges, &c.; and manufactures cottons, woollens, and silks. Pop. 60,000.

Shadwell, a parish, now included in Tower Hamlets (q.v.).

Shaftesbury (locally Shaston), a very ancient municipal borough in Dorsetshire, 3 miles SSW. of Semley station and 22 WSW. of Salisbury. It stands on a narrow chalk ridge, and commands magnificent views over Dorset-, Somerset-, and Wiltshires. The Caer Palladwr of the Britons, it was made by King Alfred the seat of a famous abbey of Benedictine nuns (880), whither Edward the Martyr's body was translated in 980, and where Canute died in 1035. At the date of Domesday Shaftesbury had three mints and twelve churches, but four remain—St Peter's (Norman) the most interesting. Till 1832 Shaftesbury returned two members, and till 1885 one. Population, 1900. See Mayo's Municipal Records of Shaftesbury (Sherborne, 1891).

Shahabad', a town of Oudh, 80 miles NW. of Lucknow by rail, with a pop. of 20,000—only a third of what it was in the 16th century.

Shahjahanpur', a town in the United Provinces, 100 miles by rail NW. of Lucknow. It was founded in 1647, in the reign of Shah-Jehan. It was a hot-bed of rebellion in 1857. Sugar is made and exported. Pop. 72,000.

Shamo, or Gobi. See Asia.

Shamo'kin, a borough of Pennsylvania, 188 miles by rail W. of New York, with rich mines of anthracite coal. Pop. 20,000.

Shandernagar. See Chandernagore.

Shandon, a Dumbartonshire village and large hydropathic, on the E. shore of the Gare Loch, 5½ miles NW. of Helensburgh. See also Cork.

Shandy Hall, Sterne's residence (now cottages) at Coxwold (q.v.).

Shanghai (Shang-hī'), the most important seaport for central China, stands on an affluent of the Yang-tsze-kiang, 12 miles from its mouth and 160 SE. of Nanking. The Chinese city, with narrow, filthy streets, is surrounded by a wall, and between it and the river lie densely-crowded suburbs. On the north of the Chinese city the French and English settlements, with broad streets, well lighted, well paved, and handsome houses and public buildings, stretch northwards parallel to the river. The English cathedral was designed by Sir G. G. Scott. Powerful batteries guard the river-approach. The city lies low, and suffers greatly from dysentery, cholera, and fevers during the very hot summers. Shanghai has an enormous trade in tea and silks, and in cottons, woollens, metals, &c. It taps the provinces of middle China by a vast and complicated system of interlacing canals, and so gets the lion's share of the tea and silk to export. The total trade of the port has grown enormously since Shanghai was thrown open to foreign commerce in 1842. A large proportion of the trade of Shanghai is for goods in transit. The imports of greatest value are cotton goods, metals, woollens, coal, kerosene oil, bêche de mer, edible birds'-nests, dyes, ginseng, matches, pepper, sandalwood, seaweed, timber, sharks' fins, &c. Pop. (with settlements) 800,000.

Shanklin, a watering-place on the south-east coast of the Isle of Wight, 8 miles by rail S. of Ryde. It has memories of Keats. Population, upwards of 4700.

Shannon, the largest river of Ireland, rises in the Cuilcagh Mountains, County Cavan, and falls after a course of 254 miles into the Atlantic Ocean between Loop Head and Kerry Head. It flows SW. to Lough Allen in Leitrim; thence S. through a succession of expansions—Loughs Boderg, Bofin, Forbes, Ree, and Derg—past the towns of Carrick, Athlone, and Killaloe, to Limerick; and finally W., forming a wide estuary some 70 miles long and 10 miles across at its seaward extremity. About 10 miles from the entrance the river narrows to 1½ mile in width. Outward navigation commences at Foynes, connected by railway with Limerick. Vessels of 1000 tons can get up to Limerick, and small steamers to Athlone; boats ascend to beyond Lough Allen. The Suck and Fergus enter from the right, and the Inny, Brosna, Mulkear, Maigue, and Deel from the left. The river is canalised for some distance below Athlone, and between Killaloe and Limerick; and it is connected with Dublin by the Grand and Royal Canals.

Shan-si, a province of northern China, having the Hoang-ho on its western boundary.

Shan States, a collective name for a large area between Burma, Siam, Annam and China, occupied by numerous tribes of Shans or Laos, a people akin to the Siamese and southern Chinese. Some of the tribes are directly dependent on Burma, still more on Siam, and others on China and Annam; many are virtually independent. The country consists of valleys and hill country on the upper courses of the Irawadi, Salwen, Mekong, and their tributaries. There are great forests of teak; iron, rubies, and silver are mined; copper, coal, and petroleum are known to exist; the country has a large trade with China, and schemes for railways from Burma and Siam to the Chinese frontiers have been proposed. The total number of Shans is guessed at 4,000,000. Zimmé (Chieng-mai) and Luang-Prabang give name to the chief states—the latter now Annamite or French.

Shan-tung, a maritime province of N. China.

Shap, a Westmorland town, 12 miles SSE. of Penrith. It has a ruined abbey, a mineral spring, and granite-quarries near. Pop. 1000.

Shapinshay, an Orkney island, 4 miles NNE. of Kirkwall; area, 11 sq. m.; height, 162 feet; pop. 700.

Shari (Shah'ree). See Chad, Lake.

Sharon, an extensive tract of plain and cornland in Palestine, lying between the sand-dunes of the coast and the foot-hills of the interior, and extending from Carmel to near Joppa.

Sharon, a borough of Pennsylvania, on the Shenango River, 71 miles by rail NNW. of Pittsburgh. Pop. 15,300.

Sha-shi, or Sha-tsze, a Chinese treaty port in Hupeh, on the left bank of the Yang-tsze, 110 miles below Ichang, with a great trade. Pop. 80,000.

Shat-el-Arab. See Euphrates.

Sheboygan, capital of Sheboygan county, Wisconsin, on Lake Michigan, at the mouth of the Sheboygan River, 53 miles by rail N. of Milwaukee. It has a harbour, foundries, tanneries, &c. Pop. 26,400.

Shechem. See Nablus.

Sheen. See Richmond.

Sheerness', a strongly fortified seaport and royal dockyard in Kent, on the north-west extremity of the Isle of Sheppey, at the confluence of the Thames and Medway, 11 miles ENE. of Chatham and 52 E. of London by rail. It consists of four divisions, Blue-town, Mile-town, Banks-town, and Marina-town, and of these the first is within the limits of the garrison. The dockyard, dating from 1814, is one of the finest in Europe, and covers 60 acres, comprising wet and dry docks, immense storehouses, and official residences. At Garrison Point are the residence of the port-admiral, the telegraph, coastguard station, and barracks. The chief trade is in supplying the requirements of the employees in the government establishments, and seeds and oysters are exported. The sea-bathing is excellent. Population, about 17,500. Sheerness was captured by the Dutch under De Ruyter in 1667, and here the mutiny of the Nore broke out in 1798.

Sheffield, a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in a hilly country, at the confluence of the Sheaf with the Don, 46 miles SSW. of York, 41 E. of Manchester, and 165 NNW. of London. It possesses some fine public buildings, such as the cathedral, formerly the parish church of St Peter, supposed to have been erected in the reign of Henry I.; St Mary's Roman Catholic Church (1850), surmounted by a spire 195 feet high; the Albert Hall (1873); cutlers' hall; corn exchange; the new market-hall, or Norfolk Market, erected in 1851 by the Duke of Norfolk; the university buildings; music-hall; assembly-rooms; theatres, &c. In 1875 and succeeding years a street improvement scheme was carried out at a cost of upwards of half a million. The new town-hall (1891–97) cost, with site, about £130,000. There are botanic gardens and fine cemeteries; the Free Grammar-school, the Wesley College (1838). The Firth College (1879) became a university in 1905, with faculties of arts and science, and medicine, and a technical department, including laboratories, foundries, and machine-shops. The Mechanics' Institution dates from 1832. There are free and other public libraries, an Athenæum, a Literary and Philosophical Society, and the Mappin Art Gallery; and Mr Ruskin founded the St George's Museum here (formerly at Walkley, but since 1890 in the town itself), in which he deposited an important collection of minerals, illuminated manuscripts, engravings, and drawings. Sheffield has long been noted for the manufacture of cutlery; and at the present day an endless variety of articles in brass, iron, and steel is produced, such as knives, silver and plated articles, Britannia-metal goods, coach-springs, spades, spindles, hammers, files, saws, boilers, stoves, grates, buttons, &c. The introduction of the manufacture of armour-plates, railway-springs, tires, and rails in 1871 gave a remarkable impetus to the growth of the town. Sheffield has several public parks and a water-supply (1912) from the Derbyshire Derwent. Pop. (1821) 60,479; (1881) 284,508; (1911) 454,632, or within boundaries as extended in 1912, 459,916.

Sheffield has from Saxon times been the capital of a district known as 'Hallamshire.' William de Lovetot built a church at it about 1103. The next lords of Sheffield, the Furnivals, sided with Henry III. against the barons, and the castle was burned in 1266. The Talbots inherited Sheffield, and the third Earl of Shrewsbury greatly increased the dignity of Sheffield castle. Queen Elizabeth imposed on the sixth Earl of Shrewsbury the responsibility of holding Queen Mary of Scotland a prisoner here (1572–86, with short intervals). Through the Arundels, the vast Sheffield estates ultimately vested in the Dukes of Norfolk. Sheffield sided against King Charles; and in August 1644 the castle was taken by the parliamentarians, and soon afterwards demolished. The cutlery trade had existed from the earliest times; the 'Sheffield whittle' was spoken of by Chaucer, and the Cutlers' Company was founded in 1624. Up to the middle of the 18th century Sheffield was a mean place, but rose in the 19th to be the 'capital of steel' in Britain, and perhaps in the world. An act of parliament setting up a bishopric of Sheffield was passed in 1913. Sheffield was first enfranchised in 1832; and by the bill of 1885 the borough was divided into five parliamentary districts, each with one member. In March 1864 a new embankment, constructed for the Sheffield Water Company, at Bradfield, gave way; 250 persons perished; mills, houses, and hamlets were swept away, and damage done to private property to the extent of near £300,000. In 1866 trade outrages in the form of 'rattening,' long a discredit to Sheffield, were put an end to. See Hunter's Hallamshire (1819; new ed. 1869); Gatty's Sheffield, Past and Present (1873); Leader's Reminiscences of Old Sheffield (1875); and Leader's Sheffield in the Eighteenth Century (1901).

Shemakha (She-mâh'ha), a town of Russian Caucasus, 63 miles W. by N. of Baku, with silk manufactures. It was overwhelmed by an earthquake in 1859, and again in 1872. Pop. 20,000.

Shenando'ah, (1) a river of Virginia, drains the beautiful and fertile valley between the Blue Ridge and the principal range of the Alleghanies. It rises in two branches, which unite 85 miles W. of Washington, and runs 170 miles NE. to the Potomac, at Harper's Ferry.—(2) A borough of Pennsylvania, 105 miles north-west of Philadelphia, with a trade in anthracite coal. Population, 29,000.

Shendy, a town in Lower Nubia, on the Nile's right bank, 100 miles NNE. of Khartoum. Pop. 5000 (40,000 before 1822).

Shen-si, a northern inland province of China.

Shepherd's Bush, a west suburb of London.

Shepley, a Yorkshire village, 7 miles SE. of Huddersfield; pop. 1900.

Shepperton, a Middlesex Thames-side parish, 19 miles SW. of London; pop. 2300.

Sheppey, Isle of, a portion of Kent, insulated from the mainland by the Swale, an arm of the Medway estuary. It now is only 9 miles long and 4 broad, the sea having gradually eaten away the northern shore, which is lined by cliffs of London clay 60 to 80 feet high. Minster church, formerly in the middle of the island, is now close to the north coast. In the north corn is grown, but the low south districts are laid out in grass. Almost all the inhabitants are massed in Sheerness (q.v.).

Shepton Mallet (locally Shep'un), an ancient market-town of Somerset, 5 miles ESE. of Wells and 15 SSW. of Bath. It has an hexagonal market-cross of 1500, 51 feet high; a church with a splendid timber roof; a grammar-school (1627); and manufactures of ale. It was once noted for cloth, crape, and stockings. Population, about 5000.

Sherborne (A.S., 'clear brook'), a pleasant old-fashioned town of Dorsetshire, in the Vale of Blackmore, on a gentle southern hill-slope above the Yeo, 17 miles N. by W. of Dorchester and 5 E. of Yeovil. In 705 Ina, King of Wessex, made it the seat of a bishopric, with St Aldhelm for first bishop, whose twenty-fifth successor in 1075 transferred the see to Sarum. The noble cruciform minster, measuring 207 by 102 feet, with a tower 114 feet high, was the church of a great Benedictine abbey, founded by Bishop Roger in the first half of the 12th century. It was converted from Norman to Perpendicular after a great fire in 1436, and was restored in 1848–58 at a cost of over £32,000. Noteworthy are the clerestory, vaulting, and choir; and in the retrochoir are the graves of Asser and two of King Alfred's brothers. King Edward's School, comprising remains of the abbey buildings, was founded in 1550, and reorganised in 1871, since when it has risen to be one of the great public schools of England, with a yearly endowment of £800 and 300 boys. Among former pupils may be named Dr J. M. Neale and Mr Lewis Morris. Sherborne Castle is an Elizabethan mansion, built in 1594 by Raleigh in the grounds of Bishop Roger's Norman castle (c. 1125), which, taken by Fairfax in 1645, is now a ruin. Sherborne has also a literary institute (1859), Bishop Neville's 15th-century hospital, and the Yeatman memorial hospital (1863), with some manufactures of lace, buttons, and silk. Population, 6000. See Horne's Sherborne Register (1893).

Sherbro, an island off the coast of Sierra Leone.

Sherbrooke, a city of Quebec, at the junction of the rapid Magog (with falls) and St Francis rivers, 168 miles by rail E. of Montreal, with many busy factories; pop. 16,400.

Sherburn, (1) a town of Yorkshire, 12 miles E. of Leeds; pop. 1700.—(2) A place 3 miles ESE. of Durham, with a lepers' hospital (1181), now an almshouse.

Sheridan, Cape, on the N. coast of Grant Land (q.v.), from which Peary reached the Pole.

Sheriffmuir', in Perthshire, on the northern slope of the Ochils, 2½ miles ENE. of Dunblane, saw an indecisive battle in the 1715 rebellion.

Sherman, capital of Grayson county, Texas, 64 miles by rail N. of Dallas; pop. 12,400.

Sherringham, a Norfolk coast town, 4 miles WNW. of Cromer; pop. 3700.

Sherwood Forest, a stretch of hilly country in the west of Nottinghamshire, lying between Nottingham and Worksop, about 25 miles N. to S. and 6 to 8 miles E. to W. It was formerly a royal forest, and the traditional scene of many of the exploits of Robin Hood; but it is now almost wholly disafforested, and is occupied by gentlemen's seats and fine parks. The town of Mansfield and a number of villages are within the ancient bounds. Numerous remains of the old forest are still to be seen. See works by R. White (1875) and Sissons (1888).

Shetland, or Zetland (Scand. Hjaltland, 'high land'), a group of more than a hundred islands, islets, and skerries, forming the northernmost Scottish county, whose capital, Lerwick, is 116 miles NE. of Kirkwall, 300 N. by E. of Edinburgh, and 222 W. of Bergen in Norway. Extending 70 miles, and 36 in extreme breadth, they have a total area of 551 sq. m., the largest of the twenty-seven inhabited islands being Mainland (378 sq. m.), Yell (83), Unst (47), Fetlar, Bressay, Whalsay, and Foula. The cliff-scenery is very fine, and the sounds and voes, or firths, are so numerous that no spot is more than 3 miles from the sea. The surface is more rugged than that of Orkney, the highest points being Ronas Hill (1475 feet) in Mainland, and the Sneug (1372) in Foula. Metamorphic crystalline rocks predominate, with isolated Old Red Sandstone; and the soil is peaty, barely one-sixth of the total area being in cultivation, whilst trees there are none. The live-stock includes from 100,000 to 120,000 sheep, some 19,000 cattle, and over 5000 shaggy 'Shetland ponies,' 9 to 10 hands high. The climate is equable but moist (rainfall, 49 inches); at the longest day the sun sets for only five hours, at the shortest for over eighteen. The herring and other fisheries are the leading industry, having been greatly developed since 1872. Shetland unites with Orkney to return one member to parliament; but it was dissevered therefrom as a county by the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889. Pop. (1801) 22,379; (1861) 31,679; (1911) 27,911. Subject, like Orkney (q.v.), to the Scandinavian crown until 1468, Shetland—the Ultima Thule of the ancients—is still markedly Norse in many of its characteristics, Norse (spoken in Foula as late as 1774) having bequeathed many words to the Shetland dialect. In 1766 it was sold by the Earl of Morton to the ancestor of the Earls of Zetland, but the present earl's property here is small. See Scott's Pirate; Edmondston's Shetland Glossary (1866); and other works by Brand (1701), Tudor (1883), Sheriff Rampini (1884), and the Rev. J. Russell (1887).

Shettleston, a Lanarkshire mining-town, E. by S. of Glasgow, by which it was absorbed in 1912.

Shiant Isles, a basaltic group, 21 miles S. of Stornoway.

Shiel (Sheel), Loch, a fresh-water lake in the west of Scotland, on the boundary between Moidart in Inverness-shire and Ardgour in Argyllshire, 18 miles W. of Fort-William. It extends 17½ miles south-westward, is 1 mile broad, is overhung by mountains nearly 3000 feet high, abounds in fish, and communicates with the sea by the river Shiel and salt-water Loch Moidart. Prince Charles Edward was here, a fugitive, in 1746; and Queen Victoria in 1873. At the head is Glenfinnan (q.v.).

Shields (Sheeldz), North, a seaport of Northumberland, on the Tyne's north bank, near its mouth, 8 miles ENE. of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. In the 13th c. the germ of the present town was a collection of fishermen's huts or 'sheles' (hence Shields). The prior of Tynemouth previous to 1279 built twenty-six houses and a quay here, but the burgesses of Newcastle frustrated his design to establish a town. For five hundred years North Shields, oppressed by Newcastle, remained a mere village, but during the 19th century its development has been rapid. The town is without any architectural character, the streets being monotonously plain, and, near the river, narrow and dingy. The principal public buildings and institutions are the town-hall (1844), the theatre-royal, the custom-house, the free library and museum, the Tyne Sailors' Home (1856), and the Master Mariners' Asylum (1838). The Northumberland Park (with remains of St Leonard's Hospital) covers 17 acres. The mouth of the Tyne forms an important harbour; the depth of water on the bar at low-water (spring-tides) is 20 feet; at high-water, 37. Within the borough are two extensive docks—the Northumberland (1857) and the Albert-Edward (1884), the one having an area of 55 acres, the other of 24. Upwards of 2½ million tons of coal and coke are shipped hence in a twelvemonth; the principal imports are corn, timber, and esparto grass. There is much building and repairing of steam and sailing vessels, and manufactures of iron, earthenware, ropes, &c.; and fishing is carried on. At Clifford's Fort is a submarine mine station. In conjunction with Tynemouth (q.v.) and three small townships North Shields forms a municipal, county, and parliamentary borough, named after Tynemouth, and sending one member to parliament. Pop. of this borough (1881) 44,118; (1911) 58,816. This town is the birthplace of the painters George Balmer and Birket Foster, also of William Wouldhave (see South Shields).

Shields, South, a seaport, municipal, county, and parliamentary borough of Durham, popular also as a watering-place, stands on the south bank of the Tyne at its mouth, 9 miles ENE. of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. On the Lawe, an eminence overlooking the river, the Romans had an important military station, in later times called Caer Urfa. Salt-pans were established here in 1489, and glass-works in 1619. The oldest, dingiest part of the town extends for about two miles along the river-bank. Ocean Road—a fine broad thoroughfare nearly a mile long—stretches from the market-place to the pier. The cliffs to the southward are hollowed into picturesque caves. The principal public buildings are the town-hall; the public library, news-room, and museum (1859); the marine school (1869); the theatre-royal (1866); and the Ingham Infirmary (1873). South Shields is in the parish of Jarrow (q.v.). The North and South Marine Parks, 45 acres in extent, are divided by the pier parade. A portion of the site of the Roman station, containing the remains of the forum, treasury, western gateway, &c., has been enclosed and laid out as a recreation ground. The south pier—a gigantic breakwater 5218 feet in length—was constructed in 1854-1892. The harbour is lined with ship and boat yards, iron, alkali, and rope works, paint and varnish manufactories, &c. The Tyne Docks, covering an area of 50 acres, are the property of the North-Eastern Railway, and ship over five million tons of coal and coke. The large colliery in the town—the St Hilda—was opened in 1810; in an explosion here in 1839 fifty-nine persons were killed. The first lifeboat was built at South Shields, and used for the first time on January 30, 1790; a memorial to its inventors Wouldhave and Greathead has been erected on the pier parade. South Shields was incorporated in 1850. Since 1832 it has returned one member. Pop. (1851) 28,974; (1881) 56,875; (1911) 108,647.

Shifnal, a town of Shropshire, 17 miles E. by S. of Shrewsbury, with iron manufactures; pop. 3400.

Shigatze, or Digarchi, a town (pop. 9000) of Tibet, stands on the left bank of the Nyang-chu, near the Brahmaputra, 140 miles W. by S. of Lhassa, at an altitude of 12,000 feet. Near by is the great Tashilunpo monastery (3900 monks).

Shikarpur', a town in Sind, stands 18 miles W. of the Indus, on the railway to Quetta and Pishin. Carpets, cottons, furniture, &c. are manufactured. Pop. 50,000.

Shikoku. See Japan.

Shildon, a Durham town, 3 miles SSE. of Bishop Auckland, with neighbouring quarries and coal-mines. Pop., with East Thickley, 13,500.

Shilka. See Amur.

Shillelagh (Shilleh'la), County Wicklow, 17 miles SW. of Aughrim, a once famous oak-forest.

Shiloh, one of the most desperate battles (6th and 7th April 1862) of the American civil war, named from a log meeting-house near the Tennessee River, 8 miles above Savannah.

Shimonosek'i, a port of Japan, at the SW. extremity of the main island, open to foreign trade since 1890, was partly destroyed during a bombardment by a combined English, French, Dutch, and American fleet in 1864. Pop. 60,000.

Shin, Loch. See Sutherland.

Shingking. See Mukden.

Shingles, a shoal, 2½ miles long, off the Isle of Wight, between the Needles and Hurst Castle.

Shipka, a Balkan pass, 50 miles NE. of Philippopolis, stoutly held by the Russians against the desperate assaults of Suleyman Pasha, August 21-26, and September 9-17, 1877.

Shiplake, an Oxfordshire village, on the Thames, 3¼ miles S. by E. of Henley. Tennyson was married here.

Shipley, a Yorkshire town, on the Aire, 3 miles NNW. of Bradford. It manufactures worsted. Pop. 27,700. See Saltaire.

Shipston-on-Stour, a market-town in Worcestershire (detached), 6 miles E. of Chipping Campden station; pop. 1540.

Shiraz (Shee-râhz'), capital of the Persian province of Fars, much celebrated in Persian poetry for its climate, its wine, and its rose-gardens, is situated in a broad plain, 115 miles ENE. of Bushire and 35 SW. of the ancient Persepolis. Rose-water is prepared; and inlaid articles in wood and metal, glass, and woollens are made here. The city was founded in the 8th century, and was a favourite resort of the Persian princes. In 1812 a destructive earthquake laid it partly in ruins, and another in 1824 cost 4000 lives, and destroyed its splendid mosques and bazaars. It was rebuilt and numbered 40,000 people, when a third visitation, in 1853, laid almost the whole town again in ruins, and caused 10,000 deaths. It has since been partially rebuilt, and its pop. is now 40,000. The tombs of the poets Hafiz and Sádi, both natives, are in the vicinity.

Shirburn Castle, Oxfordshire, 7 miles SSW. of Thame, the seat (1332) of the Earl of Macclesfield.

Shiré (Shee′ray), a river of East Africa, flows 370 miles S. out of Lake Nyasa to the Zambesi. The navigation is obstructed by cataracts (Murchison Cataract) for 35 miles, in which the Shiré falls 1200 feet. The Shiré Highlands are included in Nyasaland (q.v.). See John Buchanan, The Shiré Highlands (1885).

Shirwa, a lake of South-east Africa, 45 miles SE. of Lake Nyasa. It is 40 miles long, 15 to 20 miles broad, and 1970 feet above sea-level. On the W., between the lake and the river Shiré, is Mount Zomba (7000 feet).

Shisdra, a town of Russia, 80 miles SW. of Kaluga, on a branch of the Oka; pop. 15,000.

Sho′a, a mountainous country of Africa, usually accounted one of the chief divisions of Abyssinia (q.v.), lying S. of Abyssinia proper, and watered by the Blue Nile and the Hawash; area, 26,000 sq. m. The people, partly Abyssinians and partly Gallas, number about 1½ million. The capital is Addis Abeba (pop. 10,000), under Menelek (from 1892) capital of Abyssinia also.

Shoeburyness, an Essex urban district (pop. 5000), at the mouth of the Thames, 3 miles E. of Southend and 45 of London. Its dreary marshland, purchased by government in 1842–55, has since been the seat of a school of gunnery, with artillery barracks, batteries, targets, and other appliances for experimenting on cannon.

Sholapur′, a town of Bombay presidency, 150 miles by rail SE. of Poona, with silk and cotton manufactures; pop. 61,000.

Shooter's Hill, an eminence (446 feet) in Kent, near Greenwich and Woolwich, which commands a splendid view of London.

Shoreditch, a metropolitan and parliamentary (two members) borough of London; pop. met. bor., 111,400; of parl. bor., 110,900.

Shoreham, New, a seaport of Sussex, at the mouth of the Adur, 6 miles W. of Brighton. It arose when the harbour of Old Shoreham, now a mile inland, became silted up; and it has some shipbuilding, oyster and other fisheries, and a trade with France from its tidal harbour. Charles II. embarked here after Worcester for Normandy. The suspension bridge (1833), the Norman and Early English parish church, the 'Swiss Gardens,' and the aerodrome may be noticed. The parliamentary borough of New Shoreham, including the Rape of Bramber (177 sq. m.), and returning two members, was merged in the county in 1885. Pop. of urban district (Shoreham by Sea), about 6000.

Shorncliffe, in Kent, 2½ miles W. of Folkestone, the seat of a military camp during the Peninsular war, and since the Crimean war of a permanent one for 5000 men.

Shoshone Falls (Shoshonee), on the Snake River, in southern Idaho, about 950 feet wide, and with a clear leap of 210 feet (that of Niagara is under 170 feet). The river runs in a deep gorge between walls of volcanic rock 1000 feet high. Four miles higher up are the Little Shoshone Falls, a broken cataract of 182 feet.

Shoshong, a town of Bechuanaland Protectorate, once capital of the Bamangwato tribe, and the largest native town in South Africa (20,000), depopulated since it was superseded (1890) by Palapwe (q.v.).

Shotover Hill, an eminence (599 feet) 4 miles E. of Oxford.

Shottery. See Stratford-on-Avon.

Shotts, a Lanarkshire mining parish, 16 miles SE. of Glasgow; pop. 18,400.

Shreveport, the second city of Louisiana, on the west bank of Red River (spanned by an iron bridge of 1200 feet), 328 miles by rail NW. of New Orleans. It ships cotton, hides, wool, and tallow, and has planing and saw mills, foundries, machine-shops, breweries, and manufactories of cotton-seed oil, soap, ice, carriages, &c. Pop. 28,000.

Shrewsbury (Shrowzbury), the county town of Shropshire, on the Severn, 36 miles SSW. of Crewe, 42 W. by N. of Birmingham, and 163 NW. of London. The river here makes a serpentine curve round a hilly peninsula, and is spanned by the English Bridge (rebuilt 1774) of seven arches, the Welsh Bridge (rebuilt 1795) of five, and the iron Kingsland Bridge (1882), which lead to the suburbs of Abbey-Foregate, Coleham, Frankwell, Castle-Foregate, and Kingsland. With its steep, narrow streets, and its black and white half-timbered houses, Shrewsbury is picturesque as very few English towns. Its Norman castle has been greatly modernised; Holy Cross or Abbey Church belonged to a Benedictine abbey (1083). St Mary's is Norman to Perpendicular in style, with a Jesse window, the tomb of Admiral Benbow, and a spire 222 feet high (restored in 1894 after partial wreckage). Noteworthy also are the Roman Catholic church (1856), by Pugin; the council-house (1501–60), where Charles I. stayed in 1642, and James II. in 1687; the old market-house (1595); the new market-hall (1868); the shire-hall (rebuilt 1836, and again, after fire, 1883); the corn exchange (1869); the post-office (1877); the county infirmary (1747–1830); the eye, ear, and throat hospital (1881); the 'Raven' Hotel, where Farquhar in 1704 wrote the Recruiting Officer; the 'Quarry,' a pretty park of 23 acres, with its lime-tree avenue (1719); a Doric column (1816) to Lord Hill, 134 feet high; and a bronze statue (1860) by Marochetti of Clive. The county museum and a free library now occupy the old buildings (1630) of the grammar-school, which was transferred to a fine new site of 26 acres (now 50 acres) in 1882, since which time the number of the boys has increased from 170 to over 300. Founded by Edward VI. in 1551, though not actually opened till 1562, and augmented by Queen Elizabeth in 1571, this school was recognised as one of the seven great public schools in the Public Schools Act of 1868, and owes its greatness partly to its rich endowment (£3100 per annum), but still more to the exertions of two successive headmasters, Dr Samuel Butler (1798–1836), afterwards Bishop of Lichfield, and Dr Kennedy (1836–66). Among its alumni have been Sir Philip Sidney, Fulke Greville, Wycherley, Judge Jeffreys, the Marquis of Halifax, Charles Darwin (a native), Bishop Fraser of Manchester, Archbishop Thomson, Viscount Cranbrook, the Right Hon. H. C. Raikes, S. J. Weyman, and such scholars as Professor Kennedy, F. A.

Paley, Professor Munro, R. Shilleto, and Professor Mayor. Glass-painting, malting, iron-founding, and the manufacture of agricultural implements are industries; 'Shrewsbury cakes' and the brawn made here have long been famous. Chartered by Richard I., the borough returned two members till 1885, when the representation was reduced to one. The population is close upon 30,000. The Cymric Pengwerne ('alder hill'), after its capture in 778 from the king of Powys by Offa of Mercia the place changed its name to Scrobbesbyrig ('Shrubsbury,' i.e. 'town in the wood'), from which the modern name is derived. It has been visited by most of the English kings, and repeatedly besieged—e.g. by Llewellyn (1215) and the parliamentarians (1644). In the battle of Shrewsbury, fought at Battlefield, 3 miles NE., on 21st July 1403, Henry IV. routed Hotspur and his confederates. See works by T. Phillips (1779), H. Owen and J. B. Blakeway (1825), H. Pidgeon (1857), and W. Phillips (1878).

Shropshire, or Salop, a West Midland county of England, on the Welsh border, bounded by the counties of Cheshire, Stafford, Worcester, Hereford, Radnor, Montgomery, and Denbigh. It measures 50 miles by 41, and has an area of 861,800 acres or 1347 sq. m. The Severn, entering from Montgomeryshire, winds 55 miles across the interior, dividing Shropshire into two pretty equal portions, and being joined here by the Tern, whilst a lower tributary, the Teme, traces much of the southern boundary. Ellesmere (116 acres) is the largest of several lakes. The northern and eastern portion, to the left of the Severn, is level with the exception of the isolated Wrekin (1320 feet). The south-western portion is rugged and mountainous, and in the Clee Hills attains 1805 feet. Coalbrookdale till exhausted was the chief coalfield. The mineral wealth includes iron, lead, limestone, and freestone. The soil is variable, but generally fertile and well cultivated, so that only about one-seventh of the whole area is waste, whilst woods and plantations cover 71 sq. m. and orchards 4000 acres. Much attention is paid to live-stock. The county is divided into 14 hundreds and 266 civil parishes. It contains the parliamentary borough of Shrewsbury, the county town, and the municipal boroughs of Bishop's Castle, Bridgnorth, Ludlow, Oswestry, and Wenlock. It returns four members for the Oswestry, Newport, Wellington, and Ludlow divisions. Clive was a native; and historic scenes or antiquities, other than those noticed in the articles on the different towns, are Acton-Burnell, Boscobel, Wroxeter, Watling Street, and Offa's Dyke. Pop. (1801) 169,248; (1841) 225,820; (1871) 248,111; (1911) 246,307. See works by C. Hulbert (2 vols. 1837), E. Lloyd (1844), R. W. Eyton (12 vols. 1853–60), J. C. Anderson (1864), Mrs Acton (1868), M. E. C. Walcott (1879), Miss Jackson (Dialect, 1879–81), and Miss Burne (Folklore, 1883–85); and the 'Victoria History.'

Shrubland Hall, a Suffolk seat, with splendid gardens, 3 miles SE. of Needham Market.

Shumla (Shoom'la), a city in the east of Bulgaria, 56 miles by rail W. by N. of Varna and 80 SE. of Rustchuk. The roads from the fortresses (Silistria, Rustchuk) on the Lower Danube and in the Dobrudja on the north, and from the passes of the Eastern Balkan on the south, converge upon Shumla, and make it an important strategic place. It manufactures slippers, clothing, copper wares, and silks. Pop. 23,000.

Shuna, an Argyllshire island, 1 mile SW. of the entrance to Loch Melfort. Area, 1¾ sq. m.; height, 200 feet.

Shusha, a town of Russian Transcaucasia, 65 miles SSW. of Elizabethpol. Pop. 32,000, who make celebrated carpets and coarse silk goods.

Shuster (Shoos'ter), a city of Persia, on the Karun, 250 miles W. by S. of Ispahan; pop. 18,000.

Sialkot (See-al-kote'), a town in the Punjab, near the Chenab's left bank, 72 miles N. by E. of Lahore, with manufactures of paper and cloth. The old fort, gallantly held by a few Europeans in 1857, is now converted into public offices; there are also Sikh and Mohammedan shrines, the Punjab military prison, a public garden, &c. Population, 60,200, including the cantonment, 1 mile N.

Siam' (native name Muang Thai, 'the Land of the Free') occupies the central portion of the Indo-China Peninsula, stretching from 6° in the Malay Peninsula to Chiengsen (20° 22′ N.), on the river Mekong, or a distance of nearly 1000 miles; greatest breadth, 500 miles. The main body of it lies between Burma (British), the Shan States (partly Siamese), and French Indo-China (Cambodia and Annam). In 1893 the French advanced their Annamese frontier to the Mekong. Further changes favourable to France were made in 1904 and 1907. Certain Malay states were ceded to Britain in 1909. The area of the kingdom is now about 200,000 sq. m. (45,000 in the Malay Peninsula); and the pop., which is concentrated principally in Bangkok and the Menam Valley, is given at about 8,000,000, of whom possibly 3,000,000 are Chinese. The Malay Peninsula excluded, the plain of the Menam Valley, the adjoining eastern coast, and the Korat plateau (from 400 to 1000 feet high) occupy the greater portion of the country. These plains are fringed by hills up to 5000 feet high, and the north generally is hilly. The Menam, with a course of 600 miles, is the principal river. Two other streams, the Meklong and the Bangpakong, flow into the Gulf of Siam. The Mekong (q.v.) has a great part of its course along Siamese territory, but navigation for vessels of any size is impeded by rapids. The rivers form the principal trade-routes, and in and around Bangkok there is an intricate network of canals. Only the land adjoining the rivers is under cultivation, and the greater portion of the country is covered by pathless jungle. The climate is considered healthy for the tropics; low malarial fever is the most frequent illness amongst the European community. There are two seasons—the wet and the dry, the former lasting from May till November. The average temperature for the year is 81°; the greatest heat in April should not exceed 94° in a well-made house.

The chief production of Siam is rice. It is the national food, and its export forms the great source of wealth of the country, making two-thirds of the total exports, which amount to between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000. The other principal exports are teak-wood, obtained in the north, pepper, salt, and dried fish, cattle (for consumption in Singapore), and til (sesame) seed. Goods are imported to the value of about £3,500,000, comprising treasure and gold-leaf, cotton manufactures and China goods, jewellery, and opium. The foreign trade is mainly with Singapore, Hong-Kong, and Britain. The principal commerce of the capital is in the hands of Chinese; the labour market is supplied by Chinese coolies, and the best tradespeople and artisans are Chinese. The native Siamese confine themselves to agriculture, fishing, boating, and petty hawking, and many are simply idle hangers-on of the nobility. In addition to the exports, the country produces hemp, tobacco, cotton, coffee, cardamoms, and tropical fruits.

The wild elephant, tiger, bear (in the north), wild pig, deer, monkey, and squirrel abound in the distant jungles. Tame elephants are employed. Specimens of the famous 'white elephant' are kept in the courtyard of the royal palace at Bangkok, but are not regarded with any special veneration. Crocodiles are found at the mouths of the rivers. The python, cobra, reptiles of various kinds, mosquitoes, ants, fireflies, and tropical insects are plentiful. There are many species of birds, and the rivers and coast swarm with excellent fish. Gold has been produced in Siam from time immemorial; and argentiferous copper also is found. Alluvial tin-mines are worked by Chinese in the Malay peninsula, and iron is turned out in the north by native smelters. Rubies and sapphires are found in the Chantabun district (held by France in 1893–1905 in pledge of the fulfilment of the treaty of 1893). The only manufactures are coarse cloth and silk, rough paper made from bark, water-jars, and coloured tiles for the roofs of temples.

Pure Siamese are estimated to number only a third of the total population. The north and east are occupied by Laos or Shans, and besides the Chinese there are numbers of immigrant Burmese, Indians, Malays, and Cambodians. The character of the Siamese is essentially peaceful and indolent; they are very social, vain, and fond of bright dresses and jewellery. The houses are built of wood or bamboo, thatched with the leaf of the attap palm, and are raised a few feet from the ground on piles. Both sides of the river at Bangkok (q.v.) are lined for several miles with houses floating on wooden pontoons or on bundles of bamboo. Every Siamese, with certain exceptions, is bound to give the state free labour for about three months in the year, and to supply travelling officials with provisions and means of transport. The religion of the country is Buddhism. The sacred books are written in Pali in the Cambodian character. The old system of first and second kings has been abolished. The legislative power is vested in the king, in conjunction with a council of ministers and a council of state. There is a small permanent army, and the navy consists of a few tiny gunboats. The revenue of the country averages about £4,500,000, and includes £1,733,000 from the farmers of the sale of opium and spirits, and the keepers of gambling-houses; £1,500,000 from taxes on forests and mines, posts, telegraphs, and railways, capitation tax, land-tax, and fisheries, &c.; and £460,000 from customs. Since 1890 the government has made many reforms in administration. The civil list has been put on a definite footing; taxation has been lightened and simplified. Sanitation, education, and the administration of law and justice are all greatly improved. Railways are being extended (700 miles were open in 1914); the postal and telegraph systems have been developed; Bangkok has a telephone exchange and electric lighting and tramways, Education, carried on by the priests, is supplemented by schools for the teaching of English. The judicature was reformed in the 20th century, and extraterritorial jurisdiction modified.

Ayuthia (q.v.), founded in 1350, remained the capital till 1768, when it was taken by the Burmese, Bangkok next year becoming the capital. Cambodia was conquered in 1532. In 1893 the French dictated a treaty granting themselves a large slice of Siamese territory. See books by Pallegoix (1854), Bowring (1857), Colquhoun (1885), Coit (1886), Hallett (1889), J. Anderson (1890), Grindrod (1896), W. Smyth (1898), Young (1900), Vincent (1900), Campbell (1902), Thompson (1905).

Siang-tan, a great trading mart of central China, in the province of Hû-nan, on the Siang River, which flows through the Tung-ting lake into the Yang-tsze. Specially it is the centre of the drug trade. Pop. about 1,000,000.

Sibe'ria (Sibir) was originally heard of as a Tatar stronghold on the Irtish, captured by the Russians in 1580; and gradually widening in scope, the name is now applied to the vast territory belonging to Russia in northern Asia, lying between the Arctic Ocean and the Chinese empire, and extending from the Urals to the Sea of Japan. It covers an area of 4,833,500 sq. m.—nearly forty times as great as that of the United Kingdom—and has a population of 8,200,000. Its natural divisions, broadly corresponding to the administrative ones, are: West Siberia, including the governments of Tobolsk and Tomsk, as also parts of Perm; East Siberia (Yeniseisk, Irkutsk, Yakutsk, and Transbaikalia); Kamchatka; and the Amur region, which includes the governments of Amur, the maritime province, and part of the island of Saghalien. The great plateau of eastern Asia enters Siberia to the east of Lake Baikal, where it is 3000–4000 feet high and 1300 miles wide, and stretches thence with a gradually decreasing height and width towards Behring Strait. It is fringed on the W. by the Altai (q.v.) and Sayan mountains, and on the E. by the Stanovoi Mountains. The border-ridges of the plateau attain heights of from 7000 to nearly 11,000 feet, but very few of them penetrate into the region of perpetual snow. A broad alpine belt fringes the plateau to the NW., thickly clothed with forests, and containing several auriferous districts. Another belt of high plains (1700–2500 feet high) spreads all along the base of the alpine belt. The whole of West Siberia, between these high plains and the shores of the Arctic Ocean, is an immense lowland, whose southern part—the prairies of Ishim, Upper Tobol, and Baraba—is extremely fertile, and covered with a luxurious grass-vegetation, with masses of deciduous forest. This is even now the granary of Siberia, and exports grain to the mines of the Urals. Nearly one-third of the population of Siberia is gathered on those prairies, and is more thoroughly Russian than in many parts of European Russia. Farther north, especially between the Obi and the Irtish, begin the urmans, or immense marshes, which cover nearly 100,000 sq. m., clothed with thickets and meagre forests, in which some 30,000 Ostiaks, Voguls, and Samoyedes find scanty means of existence in hunting and fishing. Farther north still begin the tundras, which extend along the Arctic seaboard as far as Kamchatka, and cover an aggregate area of some 450,000 sq. m., with a really terrible climate. Nevertheless some 50,000 human beings wander over these inhospitable tracts with reindeer and dogs. Of the plateau which fills vast tracts in East Siberia, the upper terrace, 3000 to 4000 feet high, is quite unsuitable for agriculture, but its lower terrace (2500 to 3000 feet), especially in Transbaikalia, is good for tillage and cattle-breeding, and is peopled by both Buriats and Russians; the smaller chains of mountains are rich in gold, copper, iron, and silver. The high plains (1500 to 2000 feet), watered by the Zeya and its tributaries, and covered with a very fertile soil and excellent oak forests, are the richest part of the Amur territory, and are being rapidly occupied by immigrants, chiefly sectaries, from Russia, who already number some thousands. Khabarovsk, at the junction of the Usuri with the Amur, is the capital of the territory; the excellent harbour of Vladivostok is the terminus (since the loss of Port Arthur in 1905) of the Trans-Siberian railway (over 5700 miles from St Petersburg, and costing over 50 millions sterling). See AMUR, MARITIME PROVINCE, SAGHALIEN, KAMCHATKA, and NEW SIBERIA. The rivers of Siberia are of immense value for navigation. They all rise in the plateau, and each of them receives a tributary only smaller than itself—the Obi, the Irtish; the Yenisei, the Tunguska; and the Lena, the Vitim; whilst the Shilka and Argun unite to form the Amur. Communication in summer by sea has been established between Western Europe and the Obi and Yenisei, on which, as on the Lena, steamers ply, save when they are frozen. On the Amur steamers ply for a distance of 2000 miles. Overland communication is maintained by means of post-stations between all the chief towns—the great highway from Russia to the Pacific passing through Tiumen, Omsk, Tomsk, Krasnoyarsk, Irkutsk, Tchita, Blagoveschensk, and Khabarovka. The chief lake is Baikal (q.v.).

Siberia fully deserves its reputation of being the coldest country of the world; but it has a much warmer summer than is generally supposed. In moderate latitudes July has an average temperature of from 61° to 67°, and 69° on the Middle Amur. The hot summer and a cloudless, bright sky favour vegetation, and melons are grown in the open air in the steppes of Minusinsk and Irkutsk. But the summer is short, as a rule, and cold weather sets in very rapidly. Night frosts are usual in September, and in November all rivers are frozen. In November, even in South Siberia, the mercury of the thermometer is occasionally frozen, and in December and January it remains frozen for weeks. In the far north the cold is really terrible; temperatures as low as − 75° and − 85° F. have been measured at Verkhoyansk and Yakutsk. The population of Siberia is very unequally distributed; there are from 20 to 40 inhabitants to the square mile in parts of South Tomsk and Tobolsk, while the deserts of the far north are almost uninhabited. The total population, which was less than 1,000,000 in 1800, has now attained over 8,200,000, and it is yearly increased by some 60,000 Russian immigrants. The Russians in Siberia proper number over 7,000,000. They occupy the best parts of the territory in the south, as well as the valleys of the chief rivers. The indigenous population hardly numbers now 700,000; the Ugrian stock is represented by the Voguls, the Ostiaks, and the Samoyedes on the slopes of the Urals. Various Turkish tribes inhabit the slopes of the Altai and Sayan mountains; the Yakuts number 200,000. The Mongolian race is represented by the Kalmucks (about 20,000 in the Altai), the Buriats (250,000) around Lake Baikal, and the nomadic Tunguses (about 70,000) in the mountains of East Siberia and the Amur region. Nearly 60,000 Manchurians and Chinese stay on Russian territory of the Amur and Usuri; and 30,000 Coreans are settled around the Gulf of Peter the Great. Finally, in the north-east there are tribes akin to the Eskimos, including the Tchuktchis, the Koryaks, and the Kamchadales. On the Lower Amur we find the Gilyaks, and in the island of Saghalien the Ainos. The Russians belong to the Greek Orthodox faith, or to some of its nonconformist sects. Most Turkish tribes are Mohammedans. The Buriats profess Buddhism; and most of the Ugrian and Finnish peoples are Shamanists. The rapid increase of population which has taken place since 1875 is chiefly due to free immigration. The exiles transported to Siberia have contributed but little to the settled population. The facilities afforded by the Siberian railway have given an extraordinary impetus to dairy-farming in Siberia. From 1898 to 1904 the dairies increased from 140 to 2630 (250 of them co-operative), and the produce from 48,360 cwt. to 681,857 cwt. It is estimated that there are 25 million cows, giving milk rich in butter, of which about 80 million lb. are exported annually, two special lines of steamers from Reval and Riga carrying it in refrigerators to London. Agriculture and cattle-breeding are extending; several large districts now produce more corn than is wanted for the population, and export some. Hunting continues to be profitable in some parts. Sables, Arctic foxes, and gray foxes have become rare; squirrels, common foxes, bears, deer, antelopes, some ermines and a few beavers in the north-east, are still obtained. Fishing is extensively carried on in lakes and rivers. Tiumen builds steamers. Gold is obtained, especially in East Siberia. Silver is extracted in the Altai; lead in the Altai, and in Nertchinsk; copper is found; and iron and coal are abundant. A university (1888) and a House of Science, or free people's university (1912), have been opened at Tomsk. The Russians began the conquest of the territory in 1580, when a band of Cossack robbers under Yermak subdued the Tatars on the Tobol River. New bands of Cossacks, traders, and hunters supported by the Moscow government, and followed by dissenters flying from religious persecution and peasants escaping from serfdom, poured into Siberia during the next two centuries. The estuary of the Amur was discovered in 1849, and a military post established at the mouth of the river in 1851. The left bank of the Amur and the right bank of the Usuri were annexed in 1853–57. Nordenskiöld first circumnavigated Asia in 1878–79. See the relevant parts of Reclus, Géographie Universelle (trans. by Keane), and of Picturesque Russia; and books by Seebohm (1882), Lansdell (1882), Kennan (1891), Wright (1903), De Windt (1904), and Price (1912).

Sib'i, a pass, town, and district in British Beluchistan, traversed by the Sind and Pishin Valley Railway. Pop. of district, 74,000.

Sicily, the largest, most fertile, and most populous island in the Mediterranean, is separated from the mainland of Italy by the deep, but narrow, Strait of Messina (q.v.). Its shape resembles a triangle (whence the Greeks called it Trinacria, the 'Three-cornered'). Area, 9828 sq. m. (one-third that of Scotland); pop. (1881) 2,927,901; (1911) 3,620,571. Capo Passaro is only 56 miles from Malta; and Capo Boco only 80 from Cape Bon in Africa. Sicily is for the most part a plateau 500 to 1900 feet above sea-level, and traversed throughout its northern half by a chain of mountains reaching 6467 feet, and sending spurs to the south. The north and east coasts are steep and rocky, the south and west generally flat. None of the rivers is navigable. The only extensive plain is that of Catania, out of which Etna (q.v.) rises to 10,850 feet, with a base of 400 sq. m. in extent. The climate is warm and equable, especially on the north and east coasts; the mean temperature ranges from 45° F. in winter to 79° in summer. Only for brief periods does the dry parching sirocco drive the thermometer up to over 100°. Relics of the primeval forests of oak and ilex are left; in some districts beeches clothe the mountains to their very summits, and chestnuts, pines, and enormous holly-trees flourish; but wide tracts have been reduced to absolute sterility by the destruction of the woodlands. Malaria is endemic in some parts. The soil is wonderfully fertile, and vegetation everywhere luxuriant. Dwarf-palms abound, and dates, Indian figs, agaves, prickly pears, oranges, lemons, olives, almonds, pomegranates, mulberries, and grapes are all largely grown. Sicily's wheat still represents a seventh of that of all Italy; it sends out two-thirds of Italy's wine. Of 'green fruit' (lemons, oranges, &c.) it yields nearly nine-tenths of all the Italian crop, and sends large quantities to the United States and to Britain; and sumach, for tanning, is exported to the value of nearly a million sterling.

After agriculture, the production of sulphur is the great resource of Sicily. There are some 300 mines in the island, and 400,000 tons have been exported in a year; but the export has declined. The rich deposits of rock-salt are scarcely worked. The sardine and tunny fisheries are productive; the coral-fishery has greatly declined. Amber is worked in Catania. Manufactures are of little consequence—some machinery, cement, crockery, gloves, macaroni, and soap. Commerce is mainly in the hands of English, Germans, and Swiss. Trade is much hampered in the interior by the scarcity of good roads. Sicily has about 1000 miles of railway.

As a consequence of the successive foreign settlements on the island, the population is rather a conglomerate one; in the east the Greek element prevails, and the people are superior to those in the west, where Arab blood is strongest. The general dialect of the island differs markedly from that of the mainland. The country people are miserably poor and discontented; and the island was put under the state of siege in 1893–94. The results of this measure were not too satisfactory, for homicides, robberies, and thefts are very frequent, though brigandage on the grand scale has been put down. The maffia and secret societies flourish, and the vendetta is popular. This state of things is largely to be traced to the low rate of wages and the excessive taxes, and to the deficient administration of justice; the two former causes induced extensive emigration to America. The people are very illiterate, though nominally education is free and compulsory, and there are many schools and academies, and universities at Palermo, Messina, and Catania, the principal towns of the island.

The earliest inhabitants of Sicily were the Sicani, amongst whom the Aryan Siculi from the mainland settled in the 11th century B.C. The Phœnicians made many settlements; but the real civilisers of Sicily were the successive shoals of Greek immigrants from the 8th to the 6th century B.C. The 'tyrants' of Syracuse bore the brunt of the struggle with the Phœnicians, and triumphed (367 B.C.). But the Romans appeared in the 3d century, and by 210 B.C. the island was a Roman province. In the 9th century A.D. it was conquered by the Saracens, in the 11th by the Normans, and in the 12th became a part of the empire. Charles, Count of Anjou, acquired it in 1264, but the French domination was put an end to by the rising and massacre known as the Sicilian Vespers in 1282. The island was connected with the crown of Aragon, and then closely associated with Naples (q.v.) as part of the 'kingdom of the Two Sicilies,' incorporated with Italy in 1860.

Sicyon (Siss'i-on; Gk. pron. Sik-ee-oan), an important city of ancient Greece, stood 2 miles S. of the Corinthian Gulf and 7 NW. of Corinth. Its scanty remains have been excavated by the American School at Athens since 1887.

Sidi-bel-Abbès, a town of Algeria, 48 miles by rail S. of Oran. Pop. 25,000.

Sidlaw Hills. See FORFARSHIRE.

Sidmouth (Sid'muth), a watering-place of S. Devon, 14 miles by road, but 20¾ by a branch-line (1874), ESE. of Exeter. It lies in a narrow valley at the mouth of the little Sid between the red sandstone cliffs of High Peak (513 feet) on the west, and Salcombe Hill (497) on the east. Its esplanade is protected by a sea-wall (1838), 1700 feet long; and its parish church (1259; almost rebuilt 1860) has a stained west window inserted by Queen Victoria in memory of her father, the Duke of Kent, who died here in 1820. Sidmouth then was the favourite resort that it has once more become since the opening of the railway; its prosperity as a port, which in Edward III.'s day sent two ships to the siege of Calais, passed away through the silting up of the harbour. The climate is mild, the rainfall the least in Devon, and the beach yields agates and chalcedonies. Pop. 5600.

Si'don (Heb. Zidon), anciently a city of Phœnicia, situated on the east coast of the Mediterranean, half-way between Tyre and Beyrout. The present town of Saida, which was stormed by the allies under Napier in 1840, has 15,000 inhabitants, of whom 10,000 are Mohammedans.

Sidra, GULF OF. See SYRTIS.

Siebenbürgen (Zeebenbeer'gen, g hard; 'Seven Castles'), the German name of Transylvania (q.v.).

Siebengebirge (Zeebengebeer'geh, g's hard; 'The Seven Mountains'), in Rhenish Prussia, on the right bank of the Rhine, 20 miles above Cologne. The highest is the Ölberg (1522 feet); but the most famous is the Drachenfels (q.v.). They are crowned with ruins of castles of the 12th century.

Siedlce (Seed'l-tsay), a town of Poland, 57 miles by rail E. by S. of Warsaw; pop. 25,000.—Area of province, 5500 sq. m.; pop. 1,000,000.

Siegen (Zee'gen, g hard), a Prussian town of Westphalia, on the Sieg, 47 miles E. of Cologne. It manufactures leather, paper, linen, soap, iron, copper, lead, zinc, &c., having many mines in the vicinity. Rubens was born here. Pop. 27,400.

Sienna (Ital. Siena; anc. Sæna Julia), a walled city of Italy, 60 miles by rail S. of Florence. The streets are narrow, winding, and steep, with many mediæval features. The archiepiscopal cathedral, one of the finest examples of Gothic in Italy, was begun early in the 13th century; in 1339 it was intended to build a vastly larger church. But after the plague of 1348 the idea was abandoned, and only ruined walls indicate the ambitious design. The magnificent west front (1284–1357) of three arches is partly Pointed, partly Round-arched, and is enriched with red, white, and black marbles, gilding, and many sculptures. A fire did considerable damage to the exterior in 1890. A lofty square campanile stands on the south side. The art treasures of the interior embrace the wonderful octagonal pulpit by Niccolo Pisano (1268); the marble mosaic floor; the series of frescoes commemorative of the life of Pope Pius II., by Pinturicchio, in the Piccolomini Library; the celebrated font (1428), with bas-reliefs by Donatello, Della Quercia, and other sculptors, in the church of San Giovanni, situated beneath the cathedral. The churches of Sant' Agostino, the Servites, San Domenico, and some others contain pictures by Sodoma, Matteo di Giovanni, and other Siennese artists. The greatly venerated church of St Catharine (a native of this city) stands on the site of her former dwelling. The municipal palace (1288–1309), a magnificent Pointed Gothic edifice of brick, has a lofty tower (1325), and contains paintings by Siennese artists. There are noble palaces, as the Piccolomini, Tolomei, Monte de' Paschi, Loggia del Papa, some dating from the 13th century. The more noteworthy of the public institutions are the university (1203), with faculties of medicine and law (less than 300 students), the state archives and the town library; and an Institute of Fine Arts (1816), with many fine pictures by masters of the Siennese school. The city has also given birth to a host of other illustrious men, as Æneas Sylvius (Pope Pius II.), Bernardino Ochino, and the two Socini (founders of Socinianism). In July and August celebrated horse-races are held in the market-place. Pop. 42,000.

Sierra Leone (See-er'ra Le-o'nay, 'Lion Mountain;' usu. Le-oann'), a British colony and protectorate on the west coast of Africa, stretching 180 miles along the coast from French Guinea in the north to Liberia in the south. The colony has an area of 500 sq. m.; pop. 75,000 (many descendants of liberated slaves). This includes the Sherbro and other islands. In 1896 a hinterland extending inland about 180 miles, with an area of about 25,000 sq. m. and a pop. of about 1,300,000, was proclaimed a protectorate. The name Sierra Leone is more strictly confined to a peninsula, 26 miles long by 12 broad, and rising to 3000 feet, that projects NW. just south of the Sierra Leone (the river Rokelle) estuary. The climate is very hot and very moist, and the vegetation dense. The thermometer varies between 64·5° and 100·5° F. The low-lying districts are infested with a good deal of fever and malaria; but the higher parts are comparatively healthy. Sierra Leone has long been notorious as the 'White Man's Grave;' but the title would be just as appropriate to any of the adjacent coast-regions of that part of Africa. Coffee, cocoa, tapioca, ginger, maize, cassava, and cotton are grown; but the bulk of the exports (ground-nuts, kola-nuts, benni-seed, ginger, hides, palm-oil and kernals, india-rubber, and gums) come from the interior. Goods are exported to the annual value of about £1,000,000. The imports (clothing, provisions, wine and spirits, iron and steel goods, haberdashery, gunpowder, tobacco, &c.), mostly from England, are likewise worth about £1,000,000. The capital is Freetown (q.v.), now a fortified naval depot and coaling station. The colony has a frontier police of 290 men, besides part of the West India regiment (400 men). Furah Bay College (1828), near Freetown, belongs to the Church Missionary Society, and was affiliated in 1876 to Durham University. Sierra Leone gives title to an Anglican bishop, and contains many Methodists, besides a large body of Mohammedans. The governor is assisted by an executive council and a (nominated) legislative council. The revenue is from £300,000 to £500,000, leaving a surplus; the debt is about £1,260,000. The coast was discovered by the Portuguese in 1462. Repeated efforts to establish here a colony of freed slaves had scant success, and in 1807 the company transferred their rights to the crown. See Silthorpes' History and his Geography of the colony (both in 1881), and Banbury's Sierra Leone (1888).

Sierra Madre (See-er'ra Mah'dray, 'Mother Chain'), a general name for the mountains in Mexico that stretch northward from about Guadalajara to Arizona, forming the western wall of the plateau, and separating Chihuahua from the maritime states of Sinaloa and Sonora.—The name has often been extended to include the central and eastern ranges of the Cordilleras.

Sierra Morena (See-er'ra Mo-ray'na), a broad mountain-ridge in the south of Spain, forming the southern edge of the great central plain. It separates the basins of the Guadiana and Guadalquivir, and ranges in height from 2000 to 5500 feet. Valuable mines of lead, silver, quicksilver, sulphur, and lignite, as at Tharsis and Rio Tinto, occur.

Sierra Nevada (See-er'ra Ne-vâh'da, 'Snowy Range'), a mountain-range of southern Spain, stretches east through the province of Granada to the frontiers of Almeria, is 60 miles in length, 20 to 30 in breadth, and 1060 sq. m. in area. Mulhacen (11,421 feet) is the highest point of the peninsula. The range receives its name from the perpetual snow which covers the highest summits (down to 11,000 feet).—(2) A range of mountains in California, forming the eastern boundary of its Great Central Valley, and extending from north-west to south-east 450 miles, until in the neighbourhood of 35° N. this and the Coast Range meet. Among the higher peaks are Mount Whitney (14,898 feet high), Mount Shasta (14,440), Mount Tyndall (14,386). The sides of the range are covered with forests, gold is found, and silver-mines have been opened on the east side. The Southern Pacific Railroad crosses the range at an altitude of 7042 feet.—(3) Sierra Nevada de Mérida is the principal chain of the Andes in Venezuela, rising to over 15,300 feet.—(4) Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta is a system in Colombia, flanking the sea, the central knot rising to peaks of from 16,400 to 17,500 feet. Copper, silver, gold, and coal are found.

Sigmaringen (ng as in ring), the capital of Hohenzollern (q.v.), on the Danube, 54 miles S. by E. of Tübingen. Its castle suffered much by fire, 18th April 1893. Pop. 5000.

Sikh States (Seek), in India, are fifteen protected native states of the Punjab (Patiala being the chief), the only existing representatives of the numerous states founded by the warlike and religious sect of the Sikhs, and welded into a powerful confederacy or empire by Ranjit Singh before 1839. The Sikh wars of 1845–46 and 1848–49 led to the annexation of all the Punjab by Britain, except a few small feudatories. The Sikhs amount to 12 per cent. of the population of the Punjab (q.v.), and to 3,000,000 in India.

Si-kiang (See-ki-ang'). See CANTON.

Sikkim, a protected state in the north-east of India, bounded N. by Tibet, W. by Nepal, and SE. by Bhotan; area, 2820 sq. m.; pop. 90,000. The state lies on the southern slopes of the Himalayas, has mountains reaching to 24,000 feet and mountain-passes as high as 16,000. The maharaja, who resides at the village of Tumlong, ceded Darjeeling to the British in 1835, having already acknowledged their 'protection' in 1816. In 1888 the erection of a fort under Tibetan influence led to a British expedition against Sikkim. —Darjeeling (q.v.) is often called British Sikkim.

Sikrol, or Secrole, a W. suburb of Benares.

Silbury Hill. See Avebury.

Sil'chester, a village in the extreme north of Hampshire, 7 miles N. of Basingstoke, famous for the remains of the ancient Romano-British town of Caer Segeint, called by the Romans Calleva, and by the West Saxons Silceastre. The chief visible remains are the amphitheatre, 50 yards by 40, and the walls, 2760 yards in length; excavations have shown the foundations of a basilica, the forum, a temple, baths, &c.; and coins, seals, rings, an ogam inscription, and much broken pottery have been found.

Sile'sia, a province of SE. Prussia, having Brandenburg and Posen on the N., the Polish provinces of Russia and Austria on the E., and Austrian Silesia, Bohemia, and Saxony on the S. Area, 15,557 sq. m.; pop. (1875) 3,863,699; (1910) 5,225,962, of whom 20 per cent. are Poles, 1½ per cent. Bohemians (Czechs), and ¾ per cent. Wends. By religion 42 per cent. are Catholics and 57 Evangelical Protestants. The province is drained almost entirely by the Oder (navigable from Ratibor), which traverses it from SW. to NW. There are extensive marshy and sandy tracts, on which large forests grow; but between the Oder and the Sudetic Mountains in the SW. the soil is exceptionally fertile. In the SE. is one of the most productive coal-mining regions of Prussia; zinc and lead are also extracted. In point of industrial activity Silesia ranks high amongst the provinces of Prussia. Breslau is the capital. Early in the 10th c. Silesia, except the extreme western districts, was under Polish dominion, and in the 14th its dukes became vassals of Bohemia. In 1742 the duchies were divided pretty much as they now are, Prussia getting the lion's share; and the Seven Years' War (1756–63) confirmed Frederick the Great in possession.

Silesia, Austrian, a duchy of the Austrian empire, bounded by Prussian Silesia, Moravia, and Hungary. Area, 1987 sq. m.; pop. (1880) 565,475; (1910) 756,949. Subsidiary chains of the Carpathians and Sudetic Mountains diversify the southern and western frontiers; the duchy is watered by the systems of the Vistula (in the east) and the Oder (west). Mining (coal, iron, sulphur, &c.) and manufacturing industries flourish. The principal town is Troppau.

Silistria (anc. Durostorum), a town in Roumania, 70 miles NW. of Varna, on the south bank of the Danube, in the district ceded by Bulgaria (q.v.) in 1913. Long a formidable Turkish fortress, it has been repeatedly besieged by the Russians (as in 1828–29). On the outbreak of the Crimean war the Russians laid siege to it with 60,000 to 80,000 men, but were compelled to retreat after thirty-nine days. In 1877 again it successfully defied the troops of the czar. Pop. 11,500.

Sillery (Sil-ler-ee'), a village (pop. 400) near Rheims, famous for its champagne.

Sil'loth, a seaport and watering-place of Cumberland, on the Solway Firth, 20 miles W. of Carlisle. Prior to the opening of the railway in 1856 it was a mere hamlet, but it is now of growing importance, with good docks opened in 1857–85. Silloth, which commands a fine view, is much resorted to for sea-bathing, the climate being mild and salubrious, with a mean annual temperature equal to that of Worthing. Pop. (Silloth ward of Holme Cultram urban district) 1300.

Silsden, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 4 miles NNW. of Keighley, with worsted and nail manufactures; pop. 5000.

Sil'verton, a mining centre in the extreme west of New South Wales, only 18 miles from the border of South Australia, and 822 W. by N. from Sydney. It is connected with the railway system of South Australia. Silver, copper, tin, and gold are mined. Broken Hill, one of the largest silver mines in the world, is 17 miles SE.

Siman'cas, a village of Spain, 7 miles SW. of Valladolid, where the national archives have been kept since 1563. There are more than 30 million documents in all. Pop. 1000.

Simbirsk', a town of Russia, on the Volga's right bank, 350 miles SE. of Nijni-Novgorod. Rebuilt since its destruction by fire in 1864, it has two Greek cathedrals, a large trade, and a famous annual fair. Pop. 52,200.—Area of government, 19,100 sq. m.; pop. 2,000,000.

Sim'coe, Lake, in Ontario, between Georgian Bay and Lake Ontario, 30 miles long and 18 broad.

Simferop'ol, a town of Russia, in the Crimea, 50 miles by rail NE. of Sebastopol. From 16,000 in 1850 its pop. had by 1912 grown to about 70,000.

Simla, since 1864 the summer headquarters of the British government in India, stands on the slopes (7000 feet) of the Himalayas, in a beautiful situation, 170 miles N. of Delhi. Its first house was built in 1819, and it was first visited officially by the Indian government in 1827. There are two viceregal residences (the newer one built in 1886), handsome government buildings (1884), and a fine town-hall (1886). Pop. 16,000 in winter, and considerably more in summer.—The name Simla Hill States is given to twenty-three small native states (area, 6569 sq. m.; pop. 500,000).

Simonoseki. See Shimonoseki.

Simon's Town (pop. 7000), on Simon's Bay. See Cape Province.

Simplon (Fr. pron. San^{g}plon^g; Ital. Sempione), a Swiss mountain-pass (6594 feet high), in the E. of the canton of Valais. The Simplon Road (1800–06; cost, £720,000), one of the greatest engineering achievements of modern times, leads over a shoulder of the mountain from Brieg in Valais to Domo d'Ossola (41 miles) in Piedmont. It is carried across more than 600 bridges, over numerous galleries cut out of the natural rock or built of solid masonry, and through great tunnels. Close to the highest point is the New Hospice (opened in 1825), one of the twenty edifices on this route for the shelter of travellers. In 1898–1906 a new double tunnel (12¼ miles in length) was constructed, its Swiss terminus at Brieg and the Italian one at Iselle, costing £2,800,000.

Sinai (usu. Sī'nay; properly See'nī), the sacred mountain on which Moses received the tables of the Ten Commandments, is an individual peak in a vast rocky mass that almost fills the peninsula of Sinai. This stern, treeless peninsula is situated on the north-west of Arabia, between the Gulfs of Suez and Akaba, and shut in on the north by the desert. In this mountain-mass there are three separate mountains clearly distinguishable—Mount Serbal (6750 feet); Jebel Katherin or Mount St Catherine (8540 feet), lying south-east of Serbal; and Umm Shomer (some 8000 feet). Jebel Katherin has two well-marked peaks, a northern one called Horeb and a southern called Jebel Musa (Mountain of Moses)—the latter pointed out by tradition as the scene of the Hebrew law-giving. At its foot, in a ravine, stands the fortress-like monastery of St Catherine (founded probably about 527 by the Emperor Justinian). The Sinaitic peninsula and a strip of the Red Sea shore beyond Akaba belong politically to Egypt. See works by Hull (1885), Palmer (1871), Stanley (1856), and Haynes (1894).

Sinalo'a, a Pacific state of Mexico, with an area of 36,180 sq. m. and a pop. of 330,000. It contains over 100 mining districts, chiefly producing silver. The capital is Culiacan (q.v.); 100 miles NW. is the town of Sinaloa (pop. 2000).

Sinclairtown. See Kirkcaldy.

Sind, or Sindh (also Sinde and Scinde), a province of Bombay Presidency, bounded by Beluchistan, the Punjab, Rajputana, the Indian Ocean, and the Runn of Cutch. Area, 47,066 sq. m.; pop. (1911) 3,513,435. The sea-coast (150 miles) is low and flat, except the small portion beyond Karachi (Kurrachee), and is studded with mud-banks or sandhills. The province is traversed from north to south by the Indus (whence the name), and includes the whole of its delta. Along the river is an alluvial tract of great fertility, 2 to 12 miles wide, and mostly artificially irrigated. The soil contains in the north so much saltpetre, and in the south so much salt, that after the year's crops have been obtained these substances are extracted for home consumption and export. Between the Indus and its most easterly branch, the Nara, is an alluvial 'doab,' which, from want of irrigation, has become almost a desert. East of this is the Thur, a desert of shifting sand. West of the Indus the country is occupied by the desert of Shikarpur on the north, a desert not of sand, but of alluvial clay, the same as that of the delta, which only requires irrigation to render it fertile; and in the south it is traversed by the Hala Mountains. The climate is remarkably sultry and dry. The population consists of the native Sindis, with a large sprinkling of Beluchis and Afghans; the greater portion of them are Sunnite Mohammedans, and almost all are wholly engaged in agriculture. Trade is concentrated at Kurrachee (q.v.), the capital. Raw cotton, wool, and grain are the principal exports. Other towns are Hyderabad (70,000), Shikarpur, Larkhana, and Sukkur. Sind has been a British province since 1843. See five volumes by Sir R. Burton (1851–77), and A. W. Hughe's Gazetteer of Sind (1876).

Si-ngan-fu (also spelt Hsi-an-fu, Se-gan, &c.), a very ancient and famous city of China, capital of Shen-si, and in 1120 B.C. capital of the empire. Standing near the Wei, an affluent of the Hoang-ho, it has a large trade and many antiquities, amongst which is a stone with a Syriac inscription recording the establishment of Christianity here in the 7th century. It is enclosed by walls, and is an important commercial centre. Hither in 1900 the emperor and court fled from Peking. Pop. about 1,000,000.

Singapore, a British dependency in Asia, the most important of the Straits Settlements (q.v.), consists of the island of Singapore (27 miles long, 14 broad; area, 206 sq. m.), separated from the southern extremity of the Malay Peninsula by a strait only half a mile wide at its narrowest, and of a great number of very small islands along its shores. The surface is undulating, the highest point reaching 520 feet only. The climate is hot and moist, but the soil is not particularly fertile; nevertheless the island is perpetually clothed with verdure, and yields good crops of coffee, pine-apples, coconuts, aloes, and every kind of fruit. This island was purchased in 1824 from the sultan of Johore. Population of island, about 312,000, consisting more largely of Chinese than of Malays and Hindus.

The capital, Singapore (Sansk. Sinhapura, 'Lion City'), occupies a fine site on the SE. coast, little more than 1° N. of the equator, on the Strait of Singapore, the principal waterway for vessels trading between eastern Asia and India and Europe. This city was founded by Sir Stamford Raffles in 1819 as an emporium for British trade in the East Indies, and it has grown to be the most important trading-place in the south-east of Asia. Singapore is a picturesque, well-built town, with fine public buildings. It possesses a governor's residence, St Andrew's Protestant cathedral (1861–70), a Roman Catholic cathedral, Mohammedan mosques, Hindu temples, Chinese joss-houses, Raffles' museum (1823), the supreme law-courts, post-office (1883), hospitals, jail, barracks, and fine botanical and zoological gardens. It is defended by numerous batteries and forts, and is a naval coaling station and depot. The docks, stores, and dwelling-houses extend for 6 miles or more along the sea-front. The harbour is spacious and safe, and remarkably easy of access, with a great dry-dock, two graving-docks, and an Admiralty dock. The imports (£33,500,000) are mainly European manufactures, the exports (£30,000,000) the products of the East Indies, China, Japan, and the islands of the western Pacific. Pop. about 230,000, three-fourths Chinese.

Sing Sing, since 1901 called Ossining, in New York, on the left bank of the Hudson (here called Tappan Bay), 31 miles by rail N. of New York City. It contains villas, boarding-schools, and manufactories; but it is best known through its large state-prison (1825). The Croton Aqueduct rests here on an arch of masonry with a span of 88 feet. Pop. 11,500.

Sinigaglia (Seenigal'ya; anc. Sena-Gallia), a seaport on the Adriatic coast of Italy, 16 miles by rail NW. of Ancona. It was founded by the Senonian Gauls, and colonised by the Romans 289 B.C. There are a cathedral (1787) and a ducal palace. Pius IX. was a native. Pop. 25,000.

Sinope (See-no'peh; Turk. Sinub), a town of Asiatic Turkey, stands on a rock projecting into the Black Sea, 220 miles W. by N. of Trebizond. One of its two harbours is the best on the N. coast of Asia Minor; and it has ancient Byzantine walls and a ruined castle. Pop. 8000.

Sion (See-on$^{g\prime}$; Ger. Sitten), capital of the Swiss canton of Valais, in the valley of the Rhone, 16 miles NE. of Martigny by the Simplon Railway. It has three ruined castles perched on the crags above, and a 6th-century cathedral. Pop. 6000.

Sion House. See Isleworth.

Siout, or Asioot (anc. Lycopolis), the chief city of Upper Egypt, stands near the Nile's west bank, 200 miles by rail south of Cairo. It has several mosques, a government palace, a barrage, and an American mission school. Pop. 40,000.

Sioux City (Soo), capital of Woodbury county, Iowa, on the east bank of the Missouri River (here crossed by a bridge 2000 feet long), 128 miles (by rail) above Omaha and 512 W. by N. of Chicago. It has stockyards and packing-houses, railway-shops, planing and spice mills, and manufactures of linseed-oil, vinegar, flour, doors, &c. Pop. 48,000.

Sioux Falls (Soo), capital of Minnehaha county, South Dakota, and the largest town in the state, is on the Big Sioux River (which here falls 90 feet), 241 miles by rail SW. of St Paul. Its leading industry is the quarrying, shaping, and polishing of granite. Here are the state penitentiary and school for deaf mutes, and four denominational colleges. Pop. 14,000.

Sipontum. See MANFREDONIA.

Sirajganj (Seerajgunj), a town in Pabna district, Bengal, near the main branch of the Brahmaputra, 150 miles NE. of Calcutta ; pop. 25,000.

Sir-daria. See JAXARTES.

Sirhind, the north-eastern part of the plain in the Punjab, between the Jumna and the Sutlej, watered by the Sirhind Canal (main branch finished in 1882) and its branches.

Sir-i-kol, a great lake of the Pamir (q.v.).

Sir-i-pul (Seer-ee-pool'), a river and a city (75 miles NE. of Maimana ; pop. 15,000) in Afghan Turkestan.

Sis'tova, a town of Bulgaria, on the Danube's S. bank, 35 miles above Rustchuk. Pop. 13,000.

Sitapur (Seetapoor), a town and cantonment in Oudh, 52 miles NW. of Lucknow ; pop. 25,000.

Sitka, once capital of Alaska, is on the west coast of Baranof Island, a deep harbour dotted with islands in front, and snow-clad mountains rising behind. It has been superseded by Juneau. Pop. 1000.

Sittingbourne, a brick-making urban district of Kent, on Milton Creek, 11 miles ESE. of Chatham and 45 of London. In olden days it was a great halting-place for Canterbury pilgrims and for kings and others on their way to the Continent. Pop. 9000.

Sivas (Seevas ; anc. Sebastcia), a city of Asiatic Turkey, on the Kizil Irmak (anc. Halys), 170 miles SW. of Trebizond. Pop. 40,000.

Siwalik Hills. See HIMALAYA.

Siwash, or PUTRID SEA. See CRIMEA.

Skagen (Skāh-gen, g hard), CAPE, or THE SKAW, the most northerly point of Jutland, Denmark.

Skager-Rak, an arm of the North Sea, between Denmark and Norway.

Skagway, a port (settled in 1897) of southern Alaska, at the mouth of a river falling into the Lynn Canal. It is the terminus of the White Pass and Yukon railway. Pop. 2000.

Skaptá. See ICELAND.

Skegness, a watering-place of Lincolnshire, 22 miles NE. of Boston by rail ; pop. 3800.

Skelligs, three rocky islands on the south-west coast of Ireland, 10 miles SW. of Valentia. On one of the rocks is a lighthouse, and on Great Skellig (710 feet high) a ruined monastery.

Skelmanthorpe, a town of Yorkshire, 6 miles SE. of Huddersfield ; pop. 3800.

Skelmersdale, a town of Lancashire, 4½ miles from Ormskirk ; pop. 7000.

Skel'morlie, a watering-place of N. Ayrshire, on the Firth of Clyde, S. of Wemyss Bay, and 31 miles W. of Glasgow ; pop. 1300.

Skelton, a town in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles NE. of Guisborough ; pop. 15,200.

Skene, Loch. See DUMFRIESSHIRE.

Skerries, a name applied to various groups of rocky islets round the British coasts, especially one 2 miles off the NW. coast of Anglesey, with a lighthouse. See also PENTLAND FIRTH.

Skerries, an Irish seaport, 18 miles N. by E. of Dublin. Pop. 1820.

Skerryvore', the chief rock of a reef which lies 10 miles SW. of Tyree and 24 W. of Iona. This reef, stretching 8 miles WSW., caused the loss of one ship annually in 1804–44. In 1838–44 a lighthouse, 138½ feet high, was built here.

Skibbereen', a market-town, 54 miles SW. of Cork. Pop. 3000.

Skid'daw, a mountain (3054 feet) of Cumberland, flanking Bassenthwaite Water on the E., 5½ miles NNW. of Derwentwater and Keswick.

Skien, a port of Norway, 62 miles SW. of Christiania, Ibsen's birthplace, with a brisk trade. It was burnt down in 1886. Pop. 12,000.

Skipton, a market-town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, in the broad and fertile valley of the Aire, 26 miles NW. of Leeds. The capital of Craven, it is a gray-looking place, with manufactures of cotton and woollen goods, and is an important station on the Midland line. The castle, once the chief seat of the Cliffords, is of two periods, the reigns of Edward II. and Henry VIII., and is partly a ruin, partly inhabited. The church has some interesting monuments ; and there are also a public hall (1861), a grammar-school (1548 ; rebuilt 1876–77), and a saline spring. Bolton Abbey (q.v.) is 6 miles distant. Pop. 13,000. See Dawson's History of Skipton (1882).

Skoplje. See USKUB.

Skowhe'gan, a town of Maine, capital of Somerset county, on the Kennebec (which here has a fall of 28 feet), 37 miles by rail NNE. of Augusta. It manufactures flour, oil-cloth, axes, paper, woollens, leather, &c. Pop. 5300.

Skye, an island of Inverness-shire, the second largest of the Hebrides, is separated from the mainland by Kyle Rhea, a channel ⅓ mile wide at the narrowest. Its length is 49 miles, its breadth varies from 7 to 25 miles ; but on account of inlets no point is above 4 miles from the sea. Area, 643 sq. m. ; pop. (1841) 23,082 ; (1911) 12,719. Skye is for the most part mountainous and moory, but it contains some arable and pasture land, and one considerable plain, formerly the bed of a lake, in Kilmuir parish. The principal mountains are the serrated Coolin (not Cuchullin) Hills, which stretch irregularly north-eastward, terminating in the sharp peak of Sgurr-nan-Gillean (3167 feet) above Sligachan. Another peak, Sgurr Dearg, is actually higher (3234 feet). The most famous scene in this region is Coruisk (1⅓ × ¼ mile), the 'stern, dread lake' of Scott's Lord of the Isles. Glen Sligachan ascends 5½ miles from the head of Loch Sligachan. The fantastic Quiraing (1779 feet) and the Storr (2360), in the north of the island, are remarkable rocks, and at many points along the coast are columnar basalt formations and cliffs 1000 feet high, whose bases are frequently worn into deep caves. One cave, near Portree, afforded a refuge to Prince Charles Edward ; another, on the west coast, was the temporary prison of Lady Grange. The largest arms of the sea are Lochs Bracadale, Dunvegan, and Snizort. The coasts abound in fish—herring, salmon, cod, and ling, besides oysters. Salmon and sea-trout are got in some of the streams, and trout in most of the fresh-water lochs. Deer are not numerous, nor grouse. West Highland cattle are reared, but sheep-farming predominates. The rainfall averages 65 inches, but the climate is mild and healthy. The inhabitants are for the most part poor and ill-housed, but well-behaved and intelligent. At one time they contributed largely to the British army—not fewer than 10,000 privates during the long war with France. The population is chiefly Celtic, with, however, a considerable Norse admixture. Gaelic is gradually giving place to English. The chief proprietors are still, as of old, Lord Macdonald, whose beautiful seat is Armadale Castle in Sleat, and MacLeod of MacLeod, in whose ancient castle of Dunvegan, perched on a headland, Dr Johnson 'tasted lotus' (1773) and Scott slept in the 'Fairy Room' (1814). The principal port of Skye is Portree, a picturesquely situated village of 900 inhabitants, at which steamers call regularly. Other villages are Broadford, Dunvegan, and Kyleakin ('Hakon's strait'), the last on Kyleakin Strait, ½ mile broad, opposite the terminus of the Dingwall and Skye Railway. 'Talisker' whisky is made at Carabost, at the head of Loch Bracadale. Oil-shale was found in 1913. See Alex. Smith's Summer in Skye (1865), R. Buchanan's Hebrid Isles (1883), and J. A. Macculloch's Misty Isle of Skye (1905).

Skyros, or Scyro, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, the largest of the northern Sporades, 24 miles NE. of Eubœa. It is 17 miles long, and 79 sq. m. in area. The south is mountainous and wooded; the northern part, though hilly, has fertile plains. The only town is Skyro, or St George, on the east coast. Pop. 3550.

Slaithwaite, a Yorkshire market-town, 4 miles WSW. of Huddersfield, with mineral baths and cotton and woollen manufactures. Pop. 5600.

Slaney, a river of Leinster, flowing 60 miles SW. and S. to Wexford Harbour.

Slateford, a village 2 miles SW. of Edinburgh. Pop. 1300.

Slatwoods. See Cowes.

Slave Coast, a division of the coast of Upper Guinea, Africa, extending eastwards from the Gold Coast (q.v.) as far as the river Benin, is divided between Germany, France, and Great Britain. The British portion is treated under Lagos, the German under Togo, and the French under Senegambia and Dahomey.

Slavonia. See Croatia.

Sleaford, a town of Lincolnshire, on the right bank of the Slea, a branch of the Witham, 17 miles SSE. of Lincoln. It has a fine church (1271), a grammar-school (1624), and a monumental cross (1850). King John was struck with his last illness (1216) in the old castle, now almost wholly disappeared. Pop. 6400.

Sleswick (Danish Slesvig; Ger. Schleswig) forms, with Heligoland and the former duchies of Holstein and Lauenburg, a province of Prussia, just south of Denmark; area (province), 7340; pop. 1,621,000, nearly all Low Germans, except in the north of Sleswick, where there are 150,000 Danes. Sleswick belongs to the alluvial peninsula of Jutland, its eastern half being an undulating plain and its western a series of low-lying but very fertile marsh-lands, protected from the ocean by sea-banks. The eastern coast (230 miles) is deeply indented by several long narrow arms of the sea, some of which make excellent harbours, and alongside it lie the islands of Fehmern and Alsen. The low western coast is protected by a string of low islands and sandbanks from the waves of the North Sea. The Elbe (on the S. border) and the Eider are the great rivers; and the province is crossed by the Baltic Ship Canal (in Holstein, 61 miles long), the Eider Canal, Stecknitz Canal, &c. Nearly 87 per cent. of the area is cultivated; fishing is also carried on. Flensburg is the chief seaport.

At the dawn of history Sleswick was inhabited by the Cimbri, who were succeeded by the Angles, Jutes, and Frisians; but the greater part of the Angles crossed over into England, and their place was taken by the Danes. Successively Danish and German, or sometimes independent, for more than a thousand years, Sleswick-Holstein was the scene of an unsuccessful rebellion against Denmark in 1848–50, but in 1864 was wrested therefrom by Prussia and Austria. The dissensions between these powers led to the Austro-Prussian war of 1866, and to the ultimate incorporation of the duchies with Prussia.

Slieve-Donard. See Ireland, p. 362.

Sligo, a maritime county of Connaught, is bounded by the Atlantic, the Bay of Donegal, Leitrim, Roscommon, and Mayo. It is 41 miles E. to W., and 38 N. to S.; area, 442,205 acres. Pop. (1841) 180,886; (1911) 79,045, of whom 91·2 per cent. were Catholics. The coast-line is indented with Killala Bay, Sligo Bay, &c. The surface rises gradually from the coast as far as the Slieve Gamph and the Ox Mountains (1778 feet). Sligo contains some picturesque lakes. Iron is abundant and copper occurs, but neither is worked. The climate is moist, mild, and healthy. The chief occupation is agriculture, especially the feeding of cattle, nearly one-half of the total area being under grass. Coarse woollens and linens are manufactured; and fishing is prosecuted. The county forms two parliamentary divisions. The principal towns are Sligo, Ballymote, and Tobercurry. Sligo was anciently the seat of the O'Connors. It contains a group of ancient stone monuments near Sligo, a round tower at Drumcliff, a ruined abbey at Ballysadare, besides raths, cromlechs, and ancient caverns.

Sligo, the county town, stands at the mouth of the Garvogue, 137 miles NW. of Dublin by rail. Population, about 11,200. Sligo had its origin in a 13th-century Dominican abbey, now in ruins; it was walled and defended by a castle (1242), of which no vestiges are left. There are a Roman Catholic cathedral, a modern town-hall, a lunatic asylum, &c. The harbour exports cattle, corn, butter, and provisions. Sligo was disfranchised in 1870. See county histories by O'Rorke (1889) and Wood-Martin (3 vols. 1890–93).

Slitrig. See Hawick.

Slivno, Sliven, or Selimnia, a town of Bulgaria, at the base of the Balkans, 70 miles N. by E. of Adrianople; pop. 25,000.

Slonim, a town of Russia, 75 miles SE. of Grodno; pop. 25,000.

Sloperton Cottage, Wiltshire, 4 miles SE. of Chippenham, the residence of Thomas Moore.

Slough (slow, ow as in now), a town of Buckinghamshire, 18½ miles W. of London and 2½ NNE. of Windsor. It has grown from a mere village since the railway epoch, and is a well-built place, the seat since 1863 of the British Orphan Asylum; but it will always be chiefly remembered as the home of Sir William Herschel from 1786 till his death, and thereafter till 1840 of his son, Sir John. Stoke Poges and the Burnham Beeches, both noticed separately, are near. Population, 15,000. See Phipps's History of Upton-cum-Chalvey (Slough, 1886), the parish in which Slough is chiefly situated.

Slutsk, a town or large agricultural village of Russia, 60 miles S. of Minsk; pop. 20,000.

Sluys (Slois), a town of Holland, province Zealand, on an inlet now silted up, 6 miles NE. of Bruges; in the middle ages a great seaport. It is celebrated for the naval battle fought off the shore between the English and the French on 24th June 1340, in which Edward III. won a complete victory. Pop. 2600.

Smailholm (Smail′om), a Roxburghshire peel-tower, 6 miles W. by N. of Kelso. Near it, at Sandyknowe farm, Scott passed five years of childhood.

Smalcald. See SCHMALKALDEN.

Smeinogorsk. See ZMEINOGORSK.

Smeru, or SEMIRU, the highest mountain of Java, near the eastern end of the island. It is 12,240 feet high, and is an active volcano.

Smer′wick, a peninsula and bay in County Kerry, Ireland, where in 1579 600 Italian and Spanish soldiers were put to the sword by Grey.

Smethwick, a county borough, a western suburb of Birmingham; pop. 70,700.

Smithfield, a village of Virginia, 24 miles WNW. of Norfolk. St Luke's Episcopal church (built in 1632 of imported brick) is the oldest Protestant building in America.

Smith's Sound, one of the northern channels which connect Baffin Bay with the Arctic Ocean.

Smolensk′, a town of Russia, is situated on steep declivities overlooking the Dnieper, 244 miles by rail W. by S. of Moscow. It was a place of note in the 9th century, is surrounded by ruinous walls, has a cathedral of the 17th and 18th centuries, and was from the 14th century a powerful fortress. Here the Russians were repulsed by Napoleon in 1812. Pop. 71,000.—Area of government, 21,600 sq. m.; pop. 2,000,000.

Smyrna, the most important seaport of Asia Minor, stands at the head of the Gulf of Smyrna, which penetrates 46 miles inland from the Ægean Sea. The city climbs up the slopes and nestles at the foot of a steep hill at the SE. corner of the gulf. The Frankish quarter, which faces the quays (2 miles long) and harbour, is lighted both with gas and the electric light. The drainage is bad; the climate uncertain, but intensely hot in summer; and there were great earthquakes in 178 A.D., 1688, 1768, and 1880. Traces of the ancient walls, the stadium, theatre, and some temples can still be discerned. Smyrna is the seat of Roman Catholic, Greek, and Armenian archbishops. Carpets are manufactured, as well as pottery, cottons, and woollens. Two lines of railway run 300 and 170 miles eastwards up the Mæander and Hermus valleys; and iron-foundries and machine-shops have been established. About 700 B.C. Smyrna was one of the principal trading-centres for Asia Minor; and now it has as a seaport the lion's share of the Asia Minor trade with Europe. The harbour is large, safe, and easily accessible, but is in imminent danger of silting up. The principal exports are raisins, valonia, figs, and opium, besides barley, carpets, sponges, liquorice, wool, olive-oil, tobacco, &c. The imports are textiles, timber, and iron and hardware, besides groceries, railway plant, leather, butter, glass, petroleum, coal, cheese, matches, paper, &c. Estimated population, 250,000, of whom 130,000 are Greeks (more than the pop. of Athens), 23,000 Jews, 12,000 Armenians, 12,700 Europeans, and the rest Turks. Smyrna was originally a city of Greek Æolic immigrants, but before 688 B.C. had become Ionian. It was finally captured by the Turks under Murad II. in 1424. See a work by Rougon (Paris, 1892).

Snaith, a town of Yorkshire, on the Aire, 7 miles W. by S. of Goole. Pop. 1600.

Snake River, the largest affluent of the Columbia River, rises among the Rocky Mountains near the western border of Wyoming, sweeps through southern Idaho, forming here the famous Shoshone Falls (q.v.), and, turning north, divides Idaho from Oregon and Washington. At Lewiston it turns westward, and in southern Washington, as the Lewis River or Fork, joins the Columbia, after a course of 1050 miles. It traverses a mountainous country, in deep, lava-walled cañons, and is navigable for steamboats only to Lewiston (160 miles).

Sneek (Snayk), a town in the Netherlands, 13 miles SW. of Leeuwarden. Pop. 13,000.

Snehætten. See DOVREFJELD.

Sniatyn, a town of Austrian Galicia, on the Pruth, 25 miles NW. of Carlowitz. Pop. 12,000.

Snizort (Snee′zort), LOCH, a large inlet in the north-west of Skye, which narrows from 9 to 3¾ miles, and is 8½ miles long.

Snowdon, a mountain-range in Carnarvonshire, North Wales, stretches NNE. from a point 5 miles N. of Criccieth, near the head of Cardigan Bay, to near Conway, but is broken up into five distinct summits, the chief of which, Moel-y-Wyddfa ('conspicuous peak'), the highest mountain in south Britain, rises 3560 (not 3571, as used to be believed) feet above sea-level, and is crowned by two huts, the 'Hotel.' Its ascent is effected from Llanberis (on the north; with a railway to the summit), Beddgelert (on the south), Snowdon Ranges station (on the west), and Capel Curig (on the east). 'Snowdonia' was made a royal forest by Edward I. of England, but was disafforested in 1649. In July 1889 Snowdon was purchased for £5750 by Sir Edward Watkin, Bart. See Huson's Round about Snowdon (1893). See also STIRLING.

Soar, a midland river, flowing 40 miles to the Trent, 12 miles SE. of Derby.

Sobat, a tributary of the Nile (q.v.).

Sobral, a town of Brazil, in the province of Ceara, on the Aracaty, 78 miles by rail SSW. of the seaport Camossin. Pop. 10,500.

Sobraon (Sobrah′on), a village of the Punjab, on the Sutlej, opposite which was fought, on 10th February 1846, an obstinate battle between the British under Sir Hugh Gough and the Sikhs, which put an end to the first Sikh war. Pop. 4000.

Society Islands. See TAHITI.

Soc′otra, an island in the Indian Ocean, 150 miles E. by N. from Cape Guardafui, and 220 from the southern coast of Arabia. It is 70 miles long, 20 broad, and 1380 sq. m. in area, with a pop. of 12,000. The interior embraces numerous barren plateaus (1500 to 2000 feet), with several well-wooded mountains, rising to 4500 feet; there are fertile valleys between the ranges and belts of rich soil along the coasts. The climate is moist and warm, but healthy. Aloes and dragon's blood are products. After being occupied by Britain in 1835–39, it was taken under British protection in 1876 and formally annexed in 1886. The chief town is Tamarida on the north coast.

Söderhamn, a Swedish seaport, on the Gulf of Bothnia, 13 miles N. of Gefle. Pop. 11,500.

Sodom and Gomorrah, two ancient cities, forming with Admah, Zeboiim, and other towns the 'cities of the plain.' See DEAD SEA.

Sodor and Man. See MAN.

Soest (Zōst, not Zŏst), a town of Westphalia, 37 miles SE. of Münster, was once a Hanse town, with a pop. of 30,000; now it has under 20,000. The Gothic 'Meadow Church' was built in 1314; and there is also a R.C. cathedral.

Sofala (Sofah′la), the name given to that portion of the south-east coast of Africa which extends from the Zambesi as far south as Delagoa Bay. Sofala was described by the old geographers as a gold-producing country, the Ophir, perhaps, of Solomon. Manicaland and Mashonaland (q.v.) inland are certainly auriferous. The Portuguese established themselves here in 1505. Their headquarters, Sofala, once a large commercial town, is now a wretched place of 1200 inhabitants.

Sofia (Sofee'a), the capital since 1878 of Bulgaria, stands in a broad valley of the Balkans, on the railway from Constantinople to Belgrade and Vienna. The city since 1891 has undergone reconstruction, most of the crooked dirty streets, with their tumble-down houses and ruinous mosques, being demolished to make way for broad tree-planted streets, new French-looking houses, shops and hotels, and large public buildings (cathedrals, theatre, baths, national library, banks, post-office, &c.). For centuries the place has been renowned for its hot mineral springs (117° F.). Sofia is the seat of the exarch of the national church, and of the national university. It trades in hides, spirits, maize, and wheat. Pop. (1870) 19,000; (1910) 85,000. Sofia is the Serdica of the Romans, and was the seat of a famous church council in 343. Attila plundered it; and it was captured by the Turks in 1382.

Sogdiana, anciently a province of Persia, corresponded to the modern territories of Samarcand and Bokhara and the valley of the Zerafshan.

Sognefjord. See NORWAY.

Soham, a small market-town of Cambridgeshire, with a fine church, 5 miles SE. of Ely. Pop. of parish, 4700.

Sohar, a seaport of Oman in Arabia, stands on the Gulf of Oman, 130 miles NW. of Muscat. The Portuguese occupied it in 1508–1650. Pop. 5000.

Soignies (Swan-yee'), a Belgian town, 22 miles by rail S. by W. of Brussels. Pop. 11,000.

Soissons (Swasson^{g}), a fortified town of France, dep. Aisne, on the river Aisne, 65 miles NE. of Paris by rail, the key of Paris for an army invading France from the Netherlands. The cathedral dates from the 12th century; and there are remains of the great castellated abbey (1076), where Becket found refuge. Near Soissons is a deaf-mute institute, on the site of the famous abbey (560) of St Médard. Pop. 12,000. Augusta Suessionum was long the most important Roman town in northern Gaul. Near it Clovis overthrew Syagrius, the Roman commander, in 486. The same prince made Soissons the seat of the Frankish monarchy of Neustria. It has been repeatedly captured—e.g. six times during the Hundred Years' War, by the Armagnac party in 1414, by Charles V. (1544), the Huguenots (1565), three times in 1814, and by the Germans in 1870.

Sok'oto, a Central African state, bounded by the Sahara, the rivers Niger and the Benuwé, and Bornu. Since 1900 Sokoto has been included in the northern part of the British protectorate of Nigeria; the area is about 200,000 sq. m., and the pop. some 11,000,000. There are large deposits of good iron. The ruling race are the Mohammedan Fulahs, whose subjects are Haussa and various Negro tribes, mainly pagans. In 1885 the sultan of Sokoto granted to the (British) Royal Niger Company a monopoly of the trade.—The town of Sokoto was the old historic capital; Kano is the trading centre. See the travels of Barth (1853), Rohlfs (1866), Flegel (1880), and J. Thomson (1885), and books on Nigeria by Robinson (1900) and Lady Lugard (1905).

Solebay. See SOUTHWOLD.

So'lent, the western portion of the strait that intervenes between the Isle of Wight and the mainland of England. It is 17 miles long, and about 3 in average breadth, but contracts to ¾ mile at Hurst Castle (1535), built by Henry VIII.; and here the tide flows very rapidly.

Solesmes, (1) a great Benedictine abbey (12th century), in the French dep. of Sarthe, 32 miles SW. of Le Mons; (2) a town in the dep. of Nord, with manufactures of sugar. Pop. 7000.

Soleure (Solehr; Ger. Solothurn), a Swiss canton, bounded W. and S. by Bern, and N. and E. by Basel and Aargau. Area, 306 sq. m.; the population, 117,000 in number, mostly Catholic and German-speaking.—The capital, Soleure, lies on the Aar, 18 miles NNE. of Bern by rail. The cathedral of St Ursus was built in 1762–63 on the site of an older church (1050); and there are an old clock tower, an arsenal, &c. Cottons, clocks, and cement are manufactured. Pop. 12,000. Soleure (Salodurum) was a place of consequence in Roman times. Close by are the baths of Weissenstein, with a celebrated 'whey-cure.'

Solferi'no (i as ee), a village (pop. 1400) of N. Italy, 19 miles NW. of Mantua, stands on a hill, whence the whole plain of Lombardy may be seen. Here, on June 24, 1859, the Austrians were defeated by the allied French and Piedmontese.

Solingen (Zo'ling-en), a town of Prussia, 13 miles E. of Düsseldorf and not far from the river Wupper. Ever since the 12th or 13th c. it has been famous for its steel and iron ware—sword-blades, helmets, cuirasses, knives, surgical instruments, &c. It has also iron-foundries, cigar-factories, &c. Pop. 50,500.

Sollum, a post on the frontier of Egypt and Tripoli, ceded to Egypt in 1912.

Solofra, a city of Southern Italy, 31 miles by rail E. of Naples; pop. 5000.

Solomon Islands, a group of British and German islands 500 miles E. of New Guinea, stretching 600 miles SE. in two parallel chains. The north-eastern chain embraces Bougainville, Choiseul, Ysabel, and Malaita; the south-western Vella Lavella, Kulambangra, New Georgia, Guadalcanar, and San Cristoval. Besides these, which are 70 to 110 miles long, and 20 to 30 wide, there are many smaller ones. They have a total area of 15,000 sq. m. (of which 8357 sq. m. are British), are nearly all volcanic, and are densely wooded to the highest summits (10,000 feet in Bougainville, 8000 in Guadalcanar, 4100 in San Cristoval). There is an extraordinarily heavy annual rainfall, estimated at 500 inches on the mountains, and 150 on the coasts. The temperature ranges from 75° to 95° F. The people, 176,000 Papuans or Melanesians, are divided into a great number of tribes, constantly at war with one another, but their head-hunting and other savage and cannibal habits are now on the wane. This group was discovered by the Spaniard Mendaña in 1567; but was rediscovered (1767–88) by Carteret, Bougainville, Surville, and Shortland. See works by Guppy (2 vols. 1887) and Woodford (1890), and in German by Ribbe (1903).

Solovetsk, a great monastery on an island of the White Sea, bombarded by the British in 1854.

Solway Firth—in its upper part best regarded as the estuary of the river Esk, in its lower as an inlet of the Irish Sea—separates Cumberland from the south of Scotland. Its entire length, until lost off Balcarry Point in the Irish Sea, is 36 miles; its breadth for the upper 13 varies from 1¼ to 8½ miles, but afterwards it gradually, although irregularly, increases to 22. The principal rivers flowing into it, besides the Esk, are the Annan, Nith, Dee, and Urr from the Scottish side, and the Eden and Derwent from the English. Its most striking feature is the 'bore,' which in spring-tides rushes in from 3 to 6 feet high, and at the rate of 8 to 10 miles an hour, occasionally inflicting serious damage on the shipping; while after it has retreated great stretches of the bed of the firth are left bare, and in some places one can even cross over from the English to the Scottish shore. The salmon-fisheries are valuable. Near Annan the Solway is spanned by a railway viaduct, 1960 yards long, which, originally constructed in 1866–69 at a cost of £100,000, was almost destroyed by floating ice in January 1881, but was reopened to traffic in 1884. Scott paints the scenery of the Solway Firth in both Guy Mannering and Redgauntlet.

The Solway Moss is a district of Cumberland about 7 miles in circumference, lying west of Longtown, and immediately adjoining Scotland. As its name implies, it was once a bog, but is now drained and cultivated. Here, in November 1542, a Scottish host was routed by a handful of English borderers. In 1771 the boggy ground, swelling after heavy rains, burst like a torrent and destroyed some thirty small villages.

Somali-land (Somâh-lee), an eastern projection of Africa, between the Gulf of Aden and the Indian Ocean. The Juba, its southern frontier, is the chief river. The country is an undulating plateau, in very many places parched and barren; though in the rainy seasons swampy in parts. Game and wild animals—elephant, hippopotamus, lion, leopard, crocodile, antelopes—abound. The Somal are mostly a warlike and pastoral people of the Hamitic stock, akin to the Gallas (but with Arab and Negro admixture), and Moslems. The western and central portions belong to Abyssinia; the remainder falls into three sections. British Somali-land, with a coast-line of about 450 miles on the Gulf of Aden, extending south to lat. 8° N., has an area of 68,000 sq. m. and a pop. of 300,000. It was created a British protectorate in 1884; the chief towns are Berbera, Zeyla, and Bulhar. The interior was abandoned in 1910. The French Somali Coast protectorate, including Obock, situated round the Bay of Tajura, has a pop. of 200,000. Its railway from Jiboutil to Dire Dawa, near Harar (1902), has absorbed much of the traffic that used to penetrate from Aden by Zeyla. Italian Somali-land, on the coast of the Indian Ocean, extends from Cape Guardafui to the equator, with an area of 140,000 sq. m. and a population of 400,000. See works by James (1888), Lord Wolverton (1894), and Drake-Brockman (1912).

Somersby, a pretty Lincolnshire village, on the Wolds, 7 miles E. by N. of Horncastle. Tennyson was born in the rectory.

Somersetshire, an important maritime county in the south-west of England, is bounded NW. by the Bristol Channel, and elsewhere by Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, Dorset, and Devon. In form oblong, with a length of some 80 miles and a breadth of 36, it has an area of 1620 sq. m. Pop. (1801) 273,577; (1841) 435,599; (1911) 458,025. The surface is exceedingly diversified, with every variation from lofty hills and barren moors to rich vales and wide marshy levels, whence the sea is banked out by an elaborate system of dykes and sluices. Ranges of hills, running east and west, give the county its leading physical characters. Chief of these is the Mendips (q.v.), which stretch from near Wells to the coast at Brean Down. South of the Mendips lies the great alluvial plain of central Somerset, broken by the line of the Polden Hills, which rise some 300 feet from the marshy levels like a long, low island. Still farther south, beyond Taunton, are the Blackdown Hills, about twice as high, and continuing eastward into the broken upland which once formed part of the ancient forest of Selwood, where Somerset, Wilts, and Dorset meet. NW. of Taunton, bordering Bridgwater Bay, are the Quantock Hills, rising at Will's Neck to 1262 feet; and W., again, is the wild district of Exmoor Forest (q.v.), partly in Devon, but mainly in Somerset. The Bristol Avon, which forms the boundary of the county for many miles, rises near Badminton in Wilts, and enters Somerset near Bath. The Parret rises near South Perrot in Dorset, and drains the middle of the county: it is tidal to beyond Bridgwater, and is one of the streams possessing a tidal 'bore.' Other streams are the Axe, Brue, Yeo, Exe, and Devonshire Axe. Coal, limestone, Bath building-stone, and iron are worked. Lead was once important. The agriculture is mainly pastoral, the proportion of tillage to grazing and dairy-farming being small, though the low lands generally are exceedingly fertile. The orchards of Somerset are second only to those of Devon in area and importance, and cider is largely made; while Cheddar cheese has a national reputation. The bone-caves of the Mendips show traces of neolithic as well as palæolithic man; and there are important hill fortresses (Hamdon Castle, Neroche, Dolbury, Maesbury, Worlebury, Cadbury), and megalithic circles and other remains at Stanton Drew. Roman remains are plentiful, and under the Saxons the district became known as the home of the Sumersætan, and took its present name. Somerset was the last home of Saxon freedom when Alfred took refuge at Athelney. At Wedmore he made his treaty with Guthrum, but the claims of Edington to be the Æthandune where he won his most memorable victory are doubtful. In the Wars of the Roses, Somerset was in the main Lancastrian; in the wars of the Commonwealth it was chiefly parliamentarian, and the stout defence of Taunton first made famous the name of Admiral Blake. The county was also the centre of Monmouth's operations; and it was chiefly Somerset men who fell at Sedgemoor (1685). The county has two cities—Bath and Wells; parliamentary boroughs in Bath and Taunton; an important manufacturing port in Bridgwater; one of the finest watering-places on the western coast in Weston-super-Mare; manufacturing towns in Frome, Yeovil, Shepton Mallet, and Wellington; and seven county parliamentary divisions. See Worth's Somersetshire (3d ed. 1888) and the 'Victoria History' (1906 et seq.).

Somersham, a market-town of Hunts, 5½ miles NNE. of St Ives. Pop. 1400.

Somers' Islands. See Bermudas.

Somersworth, a town of New Hampshire, 48 miles SW. of Portland. Pop. 8000.

Somerton, a town of Somerset, on the Cary, 5 miles ENE. of Langport. Pop. of parish, 1900.

Somerville, a city of Massachusetts, a suburb of Boston, 2 miles from the central station. It contains tube-works, bleach-fields, slaughter-houses, &c. Pop. 77,000.

Somme, a river of northern France, rises not far from St Quentin in the dep. of Aisne, and flows 150 miles SW. and NW. to the English Channel near St Valéry. It is navigable for vessels of 300 tons up to Abbeville (q.v.), and its upper course is canalised.—The dep. of Somme, formerly part of Picardy, touches the English Channel on the north-west. Area, 2443 sq. m. There are the five arrondissements of Abbeville, Amiens (the capital), Doullens, Montdidier, and Péronne. Pop. (1872) 557,015; (1911) 520,161.

Somnath (Somnaut), a town of Gujarat, India, on the SW. coast of the peninsula of Kathiawar, containing many ruins and memorials of Krishna. From the Hindu temple of the idol Somnath, now in ruins, Mahmud of Ghazni (1025) is said to have carried off the wonderful temple gates, which, or some other gates, Lord Ellenborough triumphantly brought back from Afghanistan in 1842, and deposited in a lumber-room at Agra. Pop. 6644.

Son, an affluent of the middle Ganges on the right, flowing 450 miles from Central India.

Sonderburg. See Alsen.

Sondershausen (Zon'ders-how'zen), the chief town of the German principality of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen (q.v.), on the Wipper, 34 miles N. of Erfurt. It has a large castle. Pop. 7800.

Sondrio, an Italian town, on the Adda, 25 miles E. of Lake Como. Pop. 9000.

Songhay, or Sonrhai, a former kingdom of Africa, on both sides of the Niger below its great bend. The capital was Garo.

Song-ka, the chief river of Tong-king (q.v.).

Sonmiáni (Sonmiah'nee), a port of Beluchistan, 52 miles NW. of Kurrachee. Pop. 400.

Sonnblick, a summit (10,277 feet) of the Salzburg Mountains, with a meteorological observatory and a shelter built in 1886.

Sonoma, a chief seat of the Californian wine-culture, 50 miles N. of San Francisco.

Sono'ra, a state of NW. Mexico, on the Gulf of California. Area, 77,000 sq. m.; population, 260,000. Capital, Hermosillo; port, Guaymas.

Sonsonate (Sonsonah'tay), a town of Salvador, on the Rio Grande, 15 miles by rail N. of Acajutla. It was founded in 1524. Pop. 17,000.

Soochoo, or Suchau, formerly one of the largest cities in China, on the Grand Canal, 50 miles WNW. of Shanghai. It stands on numerous islands separated by canals, and has long been a noted centre of the silk manufacture and of the printing of cheap Chinese classics. Captured by the Taipings, but recovered by Gordon (1863), it is now a treaty port. Pop. 500,000.

Sooloo Islands. See Sulu Islands.

Sora, a city of Italy, on the Garigliano, 55 miles E. by S. of Rome. Pop. 7000.

Sorata (Sorâh'ta), a volcanic peak (21,470 feet) of the Bolivian Andes, E. of Lake Titicaca.

Sorau (Zo-row), a town of Prussia, 60 miles by rail SSE. of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Pop. 17,000.

Sorel, a town of Quebec, on the St Lawrence, at the mouth of the Richelieu River, 45 miles (by rail 78) NE. of Montreal. It manufactures machinery, leather, and bricks. Pop. 8400.

Soresi'na (i as ee), a town of Northern Italy, 16 miles by rail NW. of Cremona. Pop. 10,000.

Sorrento (Lat. Surrentum), a cathedral city of Italy, on the SE. side of the Bay of Naples, 7 miles SW. of Castellamare. It is celebrated for its mild climate. Tasso was a native. Pop. 8000.

Sotteville-lès-Rouen (Sot'veel-leh-Roo-on^{g}'), a town of France, dep. Seine-Inférieure, 4 miles by rail S. of Rouen. Pop. 20,000.

Soudan, or Sudan (Soo-dan'; Arabic Beled es-Sudan, 'Land of the Blacks'), a term, which in its widest sense embraces the vast region stretching from the Atlantic to the Red Sea and the Abyssinian highlands, and from the Sahara and Egypt proper in the north to the Gulf of Guinea, the central equatorial regions, and the Albert and Victoria Nyanzas in the south. This is the home of the true Negro race, though there are other elements in the population, mainly Hamitic and Semitic (Arab). The Soudan in this sense falls naturally into three divisions: (1) Western Soudan, comprising the basins of the Senegal, Niger, Benue, and other rivers draining to the Atlantic; (2) Central Soudan, including the basins of the rivers draining into Lake Chad, and covering the countries of Bornu, Bagirmi, Kanem, Wadai; (3) Eastern or Egyptian Soudan, mainly the basin of the Middle and Upper Nile. Except Portuguese Guinea and German Togo and Kamerun, the whole Soudan is now under French or English control. The western portion of what was once called French Soudan has been absorbed by Senegal, French Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Dahomey, and Upper Senegal-Niger; French Equatorial Africa includes Bagirmi and Wadai. Britain controls Gambia, Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, and Nigeria; Britain and Egypt, the Egyptian Soudan, which has of late largely monopolised the name of Soudan. Until 1882 the Egyptian Soudan formed one ill-organised province, with its capital at Khartoum. All the regions watered by the Nile and its tributaries possess highly fertile soil, capable of yielding immense quantities of cotton, durra, indigo, sugar, rice, maize, tobacco, fruits; while Kordofan and Dar-Fûr are bare and waterless, except in the rainy season. The Egyptians, established at Khartoum in 1819, gradually extended their power W. and S. Insurrections in Dar-Fûr and in the Bahr-el-Ghazal province (1877–79) were crushed by Gordon and Gessi. But in 1882 the Mahdi annihilated the Egyptian forces led by Hicks Pasha, isolated Emin Pasha in the Equatorial Province, captured Khartoum, and slew Gordon. In 1898 Kitchener re-conquered the Soudan, totally defeating the Khalifa's forces at Omdurman; and since 1899 the Anglo-Egyptian Soudan extends southwards from the frontier of Egypt to Uganda and the Belgian Congo, a distance of about 1200 miles, with an area of about 950,000 sq. m. and a pop. estimated at 2,000,000. The chief towns are Khartoum (20,000), the capital, Omdurman (43,000), Halfa, Merowe, Berber, El Damer, Suakin, Kassala, and El Obeid. It is divided into thirteen provinces, each with a British officer as governor—Khartoum, Blue Nile, Dongola, Berber, Kassala, Sennaar, Kordofan, White Nile, Bahr-el-Ghazal, Halfa, Red Sea, Upper Nile, and Mongalla. Dar-Fûr pays tribute, but is managed by its own sultan. Khartoum has railway and steamer connection and telegraph to Cairo, and by Atbara junction, near Berber, to the Red Sea (Port Soudan and Suakin), and by Sennaar to El Obeid. Prosperity has been steadily advanced, and irrigation promises great results for a large area.

Sound (A.S. and Ger. Sund), the strait which leads from the Cattegat into the Baltic Sea, having Sweden on the east and the Danish island of Zealand on the west. It forms the usual passage to the Baltic, and is 50 miles long and nearly 3 wide at the narrowest, between Helsingborg and Elsinore. Its passage, defended by the strong Danish fortress of Kronborg, was forced by Nelson in 1801. From the 15th c. till 1857 ships using this channel were charged toll.

Southamp'ton, a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough and seaport in the south of Hampshire (which is sometimes called Southamptonshire), 12½ miles SSW. of Winchester, 23½ NW. of Portsmouth, and 79 SW. of London by the London and South-western Railway (1840). It occupies a peninsula at the head of Southampton Water, and between the estuary of the Test on the west and south and the mouth of the Itchen on the east. There are remains of the 14th-century town-walls, and four out of seven gates, the Norman Bargate being much the finest, though shorn of its effigies of Sir Bevis of Hampton and the giant Ascapard. Southampton has the Watts Memorial Hall (1876), a grammar-school (1553 ; rebuilt and reorganised 1872–75), Hartley University College (1862), and the Ordnance Survey headquarters (1857). St Mary's Church (1879), by Street, is a memorial to Bishop Wilberforce. St Michael's Church, the oldest, retains Norman tower arches, and several private houses are of Norman architecture. The Tudor House, adjoining the so-called Palace of King John, is the Hants museum. God's House (12th c.) is one of the earliest hospitals in England ; in its chapel (now used for French service) are buried the Earl of Cambridge, Lord Scrope, and Sir Thomas Grey, executed by Henry V. for treason in 1415. The docks, since 1892 the property of the London and South-western Railway, cover some 300 acres. A graving-dock (700 feet by 112½) was added in 1895, the Trafalgar Dock (897 by 100) in 1905, and another (16 acres, with 40 feet depth) in 1907–12. There are direct sailings for British and Continental ports, New York (American and German lines), South America, South and East Africa. In the early years of the century the annual gross tonnage of the shipping entered was above 5 million tons. Yacht and ship building and engine-making are actively carried on. Incorporated as a borough by Henry I., Southampton returns two members. Pop. (1801) 7913 ; (1851) 45,305 ; (1901 ; with Shirley and Fremantle) 104,911 ; (1911) 119,012. Southampton supplanted the Roman station of Clausentum, 1 mile NE., and its foundation is ascribed to the Anglo-Saxons. It is called Hamtune and Suth-Hamtun in the Saxon Chronicle, and Hantune in the Domesday Book. A great part of it was burned by the combined French, Spanish, and Genoese fleets in 1338, and in the following year its defences were strengthened. Southampton is the birthplace of Isaac Watts (to whom in 1861 a monument was erected in the West Park), of Thomas Dibdin, and of Sir J. E. Millais.

Southampton Water is a fine inlet, stretching 11 miles NW. from the point at which the Solent and Spithead unite, and nearly 2 miles wide. The Isle of Wight forms a magnificent natural breakwater, and occasions a second high-water two hours after the first. Southampton Water receives the Test or Anton, Itchen, and Hamble. See works by Hearnshaw and Clarke (1910) and the 'Victoria' Hampshire (1913).

South Australia, a state of Australia, between 129° and 141° E., until 1911 crossed the continent, being 1850 miles in length. In that year its area was reduced from 903,700 sq. m. to 380,000 by the transference of its Northern Territory (beyond 26° S.) to the Commonwealth. Less barren than Western Australia, it has not the fertility of the eastern colonies, from want of sufficient rain. Two dry peninsulas, Yorke and Lincoln, or Eyria, point southward, enclosing two great inlets—Spencer's Gulf and Gulf St Vincent. A chain of mountains runs from the south-east up to the Lake District depression ; ranges, with outliers, are seen right across to, and through, the Northern Territory ; but few points rise to 3000 feet. The Murray River has its mouth in South Australia. The Torrens and a few other short streams reach the sea. Salt lakes, as Torrens, Gairdner, and Eyre, are inland ; Victoria, Albert, and the Coorong are near the Murray outlet. Rivers and lakes are very variable, often dry. Adelaide, the capital, founded in 1836, is in 35° S. lat. The area of settlement is mainly in the south-east corner of the state. In 1835 a grant of land was made to the South Australian Association ; the first party landed on Kangaroo Island in July 1836 ; and in 1841 South Australia became a Crown colony. Progress was established by the Burra Burra copper-mine in 1845, and the cultivation of large areas of corn. South Australia is geologically more recent than Eastern or Western Australia. Near the Victorian border lies the charming and productive Mount Gambier district, with its extinct craters, subterranean rivers, native wells, stalactitic caverns, and luxuriant vegetation. Generally speaking, the climate is both dry and warm, and varies less over its vast area than might have been expected. Travellers in the central desert complain of piercing cold, even to ice formation, in the early hours, though followed after sunrise by a temperature of from 80° to 100° in the shade ; 175° in the sun and 135° in the shade have been recorded. Adelaide itself, in 35° S., has known 120° in the shade ; its winter is superior to that of the Riviera or Algiers in uniform mildness and absence of frost. The north hot wind is trying to the weak. The average annual rainfall of South Australia, confined to the rainy season, is over 21 inches. The Great Austral Plains know but few and slight showers, with excessive evaporation. Yet, though the grass fails under the dryness, abundant shrubs give sustenance to live-stock, and artesian wells can draw a constant supply from subterranean streams. Droughts are often produced by the failure of the monsoon to come far enough south. Many consumptives have gained strength in South Australia. The mulberry is cultivated for silkworms. In spite of frequent droughts, bread-stuffs head the export list. Potatoes are raised in the moister south-eastern quarter, and vines are successful. In favourable seasons the drier interior can furnish good wheat. Olives and fruits are raised in abundance, and Adelaide now ships apples, as well as raisins and currants, to London. The first lead-mine was opened in 1841 ; the first copper in 1843 ; the first gold in 1846. Iron and bismuth are also obtained. The Barrier silver-mines are just over the New South Wales border. There are no coal-beds of importance. In 1855 the pop. was 163,452; in 1881, 279,865; in 1901, 362,604 (4096 in the Northern Territory), including 3890 aborigines; in 1911 (without the Northern Territory) 408,558—1439 full-blooded aborigines living among whites. State education is free. The university of Adelaide was established in 1874. The governor is appointed by the crown. The Legislature consists of a Legislative Council (18) and a House of Assembly (42); the former elected on a property qualification, the latter on adult suffrage, both including women. In 1901 South Australia joined with the other Australian colonies in forming the Australian Commonwealth, and it sends 6 members to the Federal Senate and 7 to the House of Representatives. The revenue, about £4,000,000, has generally more than covered the expenditure. The public debt (£31,752,000) was mostly incurred for railways and other public works. The oversea imports (the chief item drapery goods) are worth £6,000,000; the exports (mainly wool, wheat, and copper ore), about £10,000,000. Figures for interstate trade are not available. Port Darwin in the Northern Territory is connected by telegraph with the southern ports. The railways are 2000 miles long. From the south-eastern corner lines run into Victoria and New South Wales, and one to Oodnadatta in the interior, which is intended ultimately to meet the railway running from Port Darwin. Another transcontinental line is in progress from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie in Western Australia. See works on South Australia by Harcus (1876), Newland (Adelaide, 1887), Hodder (2 vols. 1893), Dutton, Bonwick, &c.; besides official publications.

South Bend, capital of St Joseph county, Indiana, on the St Joseph River, 86 miles ESE. of Chicago. It has a R. C. university, and manufactures wagons, furniture, woollens, paper, flour, &c. Pop. 54,000.

Southborough, a town of Kent, 2 miles N. of Tunbridge Wells; pop. 7000.

Southbridge, a town of Massachusetts, on the Quinebaug River, 70 miles SW. of Boston. It manufactures cottons, woollens, &c. Pop. 13,000.

South Caroli'na, one of the original states of the American Union, with an area of 30,570 sq. m., including 400 sq. m. of water-surface, is nearly triangular in outline, and is bounded by North Carolina, the Atlantic Ocean, and Georgia. Numerous islands of the southern part of the coast are separated from the mainland and from each other by shallow sounds and inlets. For 100 miles inland the land is generally low and level, much of it still covered with pine forests. West of this alluvial plain is a range of undulating sandhills about 60 miles in width. Farther west the 'ridge-country' rises, generally abruptly, from the Savannah to the Broad River on the north, presenting a region of rare beauty and fertility; its average elevation is 2000 feet, and several peaks of the Blue Ridge range, in the NW., rise to about 4000 feet. Most of the rivers—the largest the Santee—are navigable by steamboats nearly to the foot-slope of the ridge region, where they supply abundant water-power. The state is rich in mineral products. There are gold-mines in York, Lancaster, Chesterfield, and Spartanburg counties. Granite is abundant in several counties; itacolumite is quarried for grindstones; and superior kaolin, used for artificial teeth, is obtained. But the most important mineral product of South Carolina is its famous deposit of phosphate rock, extending about 70 miles by 30 parallel with the coast N. of Charleston. Gray iron ore (magnetite) is found; great wealth of phosphates (for fertilisers); also copper pyrites, galena, limonite, malachite, pyrolusite, and pyromorphite, or phosphate of lead. Deer, wild turkeys, racoons, foxes, squirrels, and other small game are still numerous in the forests; and the rivers, sounds, and inlets are stocked with fish. Alligators inhabit the tidal rivers. The most important agricultural products are cotton, of which over 1,000,000 bales are harvested yearly, maize, oats, wheat, peas, hay and forage.

South Carolina, called the Palmetto State from the growth of the cabbage-tree (Sabal palmetto) near the coast, had in 1880 a pop. of 995,557, in 1900 of 1,340,316, in 1910 of 1,505,400, of whom more than one-half were coloured persons and 331 Indians. Charleston has a pop. of 59,000, and Columbia, the capital, of 26,000. The mild climate is salubrious except in the rice-lands. The low islands along the coast afford summer-resorts, as well as the western mountain-region known as 'the land of the sky.' The average rainfall in the E. is from 42 to 44 inches. On the coast cyclones are often destructive. On the night of August 31, 1886, Charleston was nearly destroyed by an earthquake.

In 1562 a party of French Protestants built a fort on an island in the harbour of Port Royal, and named it Arx Carolina, in honour of Charles IX., but soon returned to France. In 1630 Sir Robert Heath obtained a grant from Charles I. of a vast territory, to be called Carolana, reaching to the Gulf of Mexico, but failure to colonise forfeited the title. In 1662 Charles II. granted to Lord Clarendon and seven associates all the territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific lying between 31° and 36° N. (later to 36° 30′ N.). In 1670 three ship-loads of English settlers under William Sayle landed near Port Royal, and in 1680 settled on the site of Charleston. The proprietary government under the 'model Constitution,' drawn up by John Locke (see NORTH CAROLINA), lasted till 1729, when George II. bought out the proprietors and divided Carolina into two royal provinces. Many French Huguenots came to South Carolina, one of the most flourishing of the British colonies, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685. In 1671 Sir John Yeamans, the governor, brought from Barbadoes 200 negro slaves; the blacks in a few years nearly equalled the whites, and since 1820 have been more numerous. South Carolina was the first to ratify the Articles of Confederation in 1788, and the first to secede from the Union in 1860, being re-admitted in 1865.

South Dakota, a north central state of the American Union, surrounded by North Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Wyoming, and Montana. The area, 77,650 sq. m., is one and a half times that of England without Wales. Most of the surface is undulating plain, which shows evidence of having in Silurian times been covered by a shallow sea or salt lake. In the W. are the Black Hills, a rugged and mountainous region (3200 sq. m.), whose highest point, Harney Peak, reaches 8200 feet. The 'Bad Lands,' or Mauvaises Terres, between the north fork of the Platte river in Nebraska and Wyoming, and the south fork of the Cheyenne in this state are covered with rocks of the most fantastic shapes, probably due to the spontaneous firing of large beds of lignite. The Black Hills afford much gold and silver, also tin (the only tin of importance worked in the U.S.), antimony, lead, copper, and other useful minerals, with thermal springs. The winters are cold and dry, with occasional blizzards; in summer the days are hot, the nights usually cool. The rainfall is small, but suffices for the ordinary crops; and pastures are extensive, and even the Bad Lands are found admirable for cattle-raising. The Missouri, with its tributaries the Cheyenne, White River, and Dakota, is the great river of the country. The population, 98,268 in 1880, was, in 1910, 583,888, including 20,000 Indians on reservations. Sioux Falls is the largest town. Other towns are Aberdeen, Lead City, Watertown, Mitchell, and Yankton. Pierre is the capital.

South Downs. See Downs.

South Easton, a borough of Pennsylvania, at the Lehigh River's mouth, opposite Easton, to which it has been annexed since 1900.

Southend-on-Sea, an Essex watering-place, at the mouth of the Thames estuary, 42 miles E. of London. Dating from a visit here of Queen Caroline and the Princess Charlotte in 1804, it was in great part built by Sir S. Morton Peto (1809–89), and has good level sands, a public hall (1872), a pier (1888), electric tramways, a concert pavilion, and a promenade extended to 8 miles in 1913–14. It was made a municipal borough in 1892. Pop. 63,000.

Southgate, a town of Middlesex, 9 miles N. of St Paul's; pop. 33,600.

South Georgia, a group of islands, in 54° 30′ S. lat. and 36°–38° W. long., nearly 800 miles E. by S. of the Falkland Isles, of which they are a dependency. Area, 1000 sq. m.; permanent pop. 200, increased by whalers to over 1000 in summer. Discovered in 1675, they were taken possession of by Captain Cook in 1775.

South Island. See New Zealand.

South Kensington. See Kensington.

South Molton, a municipal borough (1590) of Devon, on the Mole, 10 miles ESE. of Barnstaple. It has a fine church, a market-house (1864), and some woollen manufactures. Pop. 2700.

South Orkneys, a South Atlantic island group, 780 miles SE. of the Falkland Islands, of which they are a dependency.

Southowram, a SE. suburb of Halifax, York.

Southport, a watering-place of Lancashire, at the mouth of the Ribble estuary, 18 miles N. of Liverpool, 37 WNW. of Manchester, and 19 S. by W. of Preston. The first house was a wooden inn built from a wreck here in 1792, on what then was a sandy waste; since about 1830 the place has grown more and more popular, enjoying as it does a mild climate, and having broad level sands. The esplanade (3 miles long) commands views of the Welsh and Cumberland mountains, and from it projects a pier (1465 yards) constructed in 1859–68 at a cost of £25,000, with a steam tramway running along it. Other features of Southport, with date and cost, are the Pavilion and Winter Gardens (1874; £140,000), comprising a theatre, concert-hall, aquaria, &c.; opera-house (1891; seating 2000); the Cambridge Hall (1874; £25,000), with a clock-tower 127 feet high; the Victoria Baths (1871; £45,000); the Atkinson Public Library and Art Gallery (1878; nearly £15,000); the Grecian town-hall (1853); the market-hall (1881; £40,000); the Victoria Schools of Science and Art (1887); the convalescent hospital (founded 1806; present building 1854–87); the Hesketh Public Park of 30 acres (1868); and a marine park and lake (1887; £13,000) on the foreshore fronting the town. Nathaniel Hawthorne, then United States consul at Liverpool, describes Southport as it was in 1856 in his English Notebooks (1870). It was made a municipal borough in 1867, a county borough in 1905. Pop. (as extended in 1875 and 1912), 70,000.

Southsea, a south-eastern suburb of Portsmouth, is a fashionable watering-place of recent growth, with two piers, a fine esplanade 2 miles long, a canoe lake, a common, a modernised castle of 1540, and other fortifications, barracks, &c.

South Shetlands, a group of snow-clad islands in the Atlantic, in 60° S. lat. and 60° W. long., an important whaling station, a dependency of the Falkland Islands.

South Shields. See Shields.

Southwark (Suth'ark; th as in this), or 'The Borough,' on the Surrey side of the Thames, annexed to the city in 1327, is now a metropolitan borough, with a cathedral; pop. 192,000.

Southwell (locally Suth'l; soft th), a city of Nottinghamshire, on the ancient Ermine Street, 7 miles W. by S. of Newark and 12 NE. of Nottingham. A church was founded here by Paulinus about 630; but the stately cruciform minster, which with its three towers resembles York on a smaller scale, is wholly of post-Conquest date, comprising Norman nave and transepts (1110), Early English choir (1250), and Early Decorated chapter-house (1300). It measures 306 feet by 123 across the transepts, and the lantern tower is 105 feet high. A collegiate church until 1841, it became in 1884 the cathedral of a new diocese including the counties of Notts and Derbyshire, and taken from Lincoln and Lichfield; in 1888 it was reopened after restoration. Its eagle lectern originally belonged to Newstead priory, having been fished out of the lake there about 1750. In the old 'Saracen's Head' Charles I. surrendered to the Scots commissioners (1646); Byron's mother occupied Burgage Manor House (1804–7); and there are picturesque ruins of the palace of the Archbishops of York (c. 1360; much altered and enlarged by Wolsey). The collegiate grammar-school was refounded in Henry VIII.'s time; and there are a literary institute and free library. Population of parish, 3350. See works by Rastall (1787, 1801), Shilton (1818), Dimock (1884), Livett (1883), and Leach (1890).

Southwick, a NW. suburb of Sunderland.

Southwold (South'old), a Suffolk watering-place, 41 miles by a small branch-line NE. of Ipswich. A municipal borough since 1489, it was almost destroyed by fire in 1659, but retained its fine Perpendicular church (1460), 144 feet long. In Southwold or Sole Bay a bloody but indecisive sea-fight was fought between the English and the Dutch on 28th May 1672. Pop. 2600.

Soutra (Soo'tra), a hospice (c. 1164) in Midlothian, on Soutra Hill (1209 feet), 17 miles SE. of Edinburgh. See a work by J. Hunter (1892).

Sow, a Staffordshire river, flowing 18 miles to the Trent, near Tixall.

Sowerby Bridge, a manufacturing town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Calder, 3 miles SW. of Halifax. It has a town-hall (1857) and manufactures of worsted and cotton, oilcloth, chemicals, iron, &c. Tillotson was a native of the parish. Pop. 11,400.

Spa, a watering-place of Belgium, stands amid wooded and romantic hills, 20 miles by rail SE. of Liége, near the Prussian frontier. The springs, all chalybeate and alkaline, are cold, bright, and sparkling, and efficacious in anæmic complaints, nervous diseases, &c. Fancy wooden lacquered ware is manufactured. Pop. 8200. The number of visitors during the season (May–October) is about 15,000. The place was particularly famous as a fashionable resort in the 16th and 18th centuries, and derived great profit from its public gaming-tables, suppressed in 1872.

Spaccaforno, a town of SE. Sicily, 30 miles SW. of Syracuse. Near it are 'Troglodyte' caves, ranged tier upon tier. Pop. 12,000.

Spain (Span. España), occupying the larger part of the south-western peninsula of Europe, lies in 43° 45′—36° 1′ N. lat., and 3° 20′ E.—9° 32′ W. long., and is bounded by the Bay of Biscay, the Pyrenees, the Mediterranean, the Atlantic, and Portugal. From Fuenterrabía in the N. to Cape Tarifa in the S. is 560, from Cape Finisterre in the NW. to Cape Creux in the NE. is 650 miles. Area, 194,864 sq. m.; pop. (1877) 16,634,345; (1887) 17,565,632; (1910, census) 19,588,688. The country, including the Balearic and Canary Isles, was divided in 1834 into forty-nine provinces, mostly named after the great towns; but the names of the fourteen more ancient kingdoms, states, and provinces are still in use (Old Castile, New Castile, La Mancha, Leon, Asturias, Galicia, Estremadura, Andalusia, Murcia, Valencia, Aragon, Catalonia, and the Basque Provinces). The Balearic Islands and the Canaries are reckoned to the mother country, not to the colonies. Of the remainder of the once great colonies of Spain, Cuba was relinquished, and the Philippines, Porto Rico, and Guam, the largest of the Ladrones, were ceded to the United States after the war of 1898. The rest of the Ladrones, with the Caroline and Pelew Islands, were ceded to Germany in 1899. The colonies were thus reduced to the African holdings. Excluding the zone in northern Morocco, added in 1912, these are:

	Area in sq. miles.	Population.
Rio de Oro, Adrar	72,000	12,000
Fernando Po, Rio Muni, &c.	11,000	200,000
Ifni, Melilla, &c.	100	60,000
Total	83,100	272,000

The uniform coast-line and the great elevation of its central plateau—the greater part of the surface being a tableland 2000–3000 feet above sea-level—give Spain a more continental character in its extreme range of temperature than any of the other peninsulas of Europe. Outside the plateau lie the highest summits in the country, the Pic de Néthou in the Pyrenees (11,165 feet), Mulhacen (11,420), and Veleta (11,385), in the Sierra Nevada, while the Picos de Europa in the Cantabrian Range attain over 8000 feet. The plateau itself is traversed by four mountain-ranges, which separate the valley of the Ebro from that of the Douro; and the whole of it has a general slight inclination from east or north-east to south-west. Hence all the considerable rivers except the Ebro flow westward to the Atlantic. The configuration of the country renders the climate very varied. In parts of the north-west the rainfall is among the heaviest in Europe. In the east and south-east occasionally no rain falls in the whole year. The rainfall in the Western Pyrenees is very great, yet on the northern slope of the valley of the Ebro there are districts almost rainless. The western side of the great plateau, speaking generally, is more humid and much colder than the eastern, where irrigation is necessary for successful cultivation. Galicia is almost a cattle country; Estremadura possesses vast flocks of sheep and herds of swine. The vegetable productions of Galicia and the Asturias are almost those of Devonshire and of south-west Ireland. Till the 18th century cider was the great beverage in the north; but in the basin of the Minho, in the Riojas on the Ebro, in Navarre, Aragon, and Catalonia strong red wines are grown in abundance. The productions of Catalonia and Tarragona are almost those of Provence and the Riviera. The plains of Leon and of Old and New Castile are excellent corn-growing regions. From Valencia southwards the products are semi-tropical; the climate is almost more tropical than that of the opposite coast of Africa. Fruits of all kinds, luscious or fiery wines, oil, rice, esparto grass, and sugar are common along the coast. No other part of the soil of Europe is so rich in varied produce. Large tracts of Spain once cultivated in Roman or in Moorish times now lie abandoned and unproductive; 46 per cent. of the whole is uncultivated.

For a moment in the 16th century Spain was the most important country in Europe; but the population was unequal to the drain upon it caused by constant warfare, emigration, and adverse economical and industrial conditions. Thus a pop. of over 10 millions at the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th centuries fell to little more than 6 millions in the 17th: the numbers then slowly rose: (1768) 9,307,804; (1857) 15,464,340; (1897) 18,089,500. In 1910 there were two cities with over 580,000 inhabitants, Madrid and Barcelona; one of 233,000, Valencia; three of between 160,000 and 130,000, Seville, Malaga, and Murcia. The densest population is in Madrid, Barcelona, Pontevedra, and the Basque Provinces. Emigration (to South America, Algeria, and elsewhere) is steadily on the increase. Some 60 or 70 per cent. of the population are engaged in agriculture, and 10 or 11 per cent. in mining or manufacturing and trade. Since the sale of church, crown, and much of the municipal property during the 19th century the land has become much divided; it is estimated that there are about 3½ millions of holdings, of which ¾ million are occupied by tenants, the rest by proprietors. The seat of the manufacturing industries—mainly cotton—is chiefly Catalonia; and the manufacture of corks (30,000 tons yearly) employs over 8000 men in that province. The mineral wealth is more widely distributed—iron in Biscay and the province of Huelva; copper at Huelva, in the Rio Tinto and Tharsis mines; lead at Linares; quicksilver at Almaden; coal chiefly in the Asturias; salt in Catalonia, and by evaporation near Cadiz. The annual produce of iron ore is from 7,000,000 to 9,000,000 tons (seven-eighths of which is exported); of copper, 3,000,000; of coal, 3,600,000 tons. A considerable proportion of iron, lead, copper, zinc, and quicksilver is smelted or prepared in the country. The total value of metallurgical products in one year may be from £6,000,000 to £7,000,000. Until lately the only religion tolerated was that of the state, the Roman Catholic; now increasing toleration is allowed to other denominations. In the large towns and in some of the provinces a great effort is made to keep the higher and the technical schools on a level with the best in other European countries. In other parts the neglect of education is very great. 33·4 per cent. in 1910 could read and write. There are universities in Madrid, Barcelona, Granada, Oviedo, Salamanca, Seville, Santiago, Valencia, Valladolid, and Saragossa, with about 16,000 students. School education is legally compulsory, and, in general, free. Many of the primary schools in the provinces are in a wretched condition, the salary of the teachers being only about £5 per annum. The great fault of the higher Spanish education is in the numbers who press into professional, literary, and political careers in comparison with those who dedicate themselves to commercial, industrial, or agricultural pursuits. By reason of this Spain loses great part of the advantages of her natural wealth. All her principal mines are worked, her railways built, schemes of irrigation carried out with foreign capital, and in spite of the excellence of her labourers the higher employees are often foreigners. The imports in 1877 amounted to £16,340,000, and the exports to £18,175,000; in 1910 they had increased to £34,100,000 and £35,250,000 respectively (taking the peseta at its actual value=8½d.). For a time the increase was chiefly due to the export of wine to France and to the imports from that country. The exports to France have a total value of something over £9,000,000, and the imports from France of about £7,000,000. The total exports from Spain to Great Britain are about £15,000,000, and the imports £6,500,000. There are 9000 miles of railway and 27,000 miles of telegraph.

The government of Spain is a hereditary monarchy. The Cortes consists of two bodies—the Senate (partly hereditary, nominated, and elected) and the Chamber of Deputies, elected by universal suffrage. The public debt of Spain is about £336,657,000, and the annual charge £14,500,000. The revenue and expenditure, nominally nearly balanced, rose from £31,000,000 in 1881 to £40,000,000 in 1912. The navy of Spain consists of a small number of cruisers, gunboats, torpedo craft, &c., manned by 700 officers and 16,000 men. A large proportion of the navy was lost in the war with the United States in 1898. The army on a peace footing is 128,000, including the Guardia civil or gendarmes, the Carabineros, and other active or reserve forces.

Spain was originally occupied by Iberian tribes (akin to the present Basque inhabitants of the north), who were partially overlaid by invading Celts. The Carthaginians established themselves in the south of Spain in the 3d century B.C. The Romans appeared in force in the next century, but it was not till after a fierce and prolonged resistance from Iberians and Celtiberians that, under Augustus, the Roman conquest was complete. Soon Spain, thoroughly Romanised, was contributing largely to Latin literature and Roman culture. The Germanic invaders from the north, Suevi, Vandals, and Visigoths, crushed the Roman power in the 5th century A.D., and Spain became a province of the Visigothic kingdom (573 A.D.). The Moorish conquest was very rapid (714–732) and complete, except in the north and north-west. The several Christian kingdoms of Spain—Castile, Leon, Navarre, Aragon, &c., as well as Portugal—were formed by the gradual depression of the Moors; but Moorish Granada was not conquered till 1492, and Spain was not united under one rule till 1512. Spain became a European state with the union of Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile in 1469, and the New World was discovered for them; under their son, the Emperor Charles V., Spain was in the forefront of European history, and Flanders and the two Sicilies Spanish provinces. With Philip II., Charles's son, the decline of Spain set in, though now for sixty years Portugal was under the Spanish crown. The Bourbon dynasty brought complication in the wars of Louis XIV., and little advantage from the recovery of Naples and Sicily. The nadir of Spanish history is in the time of Napoleon, when Spain, in spite of some national efforts, was nominally a kingdom, but really a mere province of the French empire. In spite of the valiant patriotism shown in resisting the French, and the ultimate recovery of national independence (by English help) through the overthrow of Napoleon, the history of Spain in the 19th century was in the main inglorious, the disastrous American war, at its close, leading to the loss of the greater colonies. The 20th has seen gradual recovery, growing toleration, a breach with the Vatican, revolutionary and repressive movements, and ambitions in NW. Africa.

Spa'lato (less correctly Spalatro; Slav. Split), the busiest town of Dalmatia, stands on a promontory on the east side of the Adriatic, 160 miles SE. of Fiume, and with a branch-line to the Bosnian railway (1894–1900). Here, in a beautiful situation on the seashore, the Emperor Diocletian built for himself a colossal palace (Salonæ Palatium, whence, or from its Greek equivalent, comes the name Spalato), to which he retired when he abdicated the throne in 305. The massive walls were from 570 to 700 feet long and 50 to 70 feet high, and enclosed an area of 9½ acres. This gigantic palace, square, like a Roman camp, with a gate in the middle of each side, is still standing in a fairly good state of preservation, its temple being the present Christian Cathedral; but the interior was converted into a town in 639 by the citizens of the adjoining city of Savona who escaped the Avars, and it has been so occupied ever since. The existing city of Spalato, lying more than half of it outside the palace walls, is one of the principal ports for Bosnia and Herzegovina, and manufactures liqueurs (rosolio and maraschino), bricks, ropes, &c. Pop. 31,500. See Freeman's Historical Essays (3d series, 1879); and T. G. Jackson's Dalmatia (vol. ii. 1887).

Spalding, a Dutch-looking town on the Welland in Lincolnshire, 14 miles SW. of Boston, with a fine church (Decorated and Perpendicular), built in 1284 and restored by Sir G. Scott, who also planned two of the other three churches in the town. The grammar-school, of which Bentley was master in 1682, was founded in 1568; new school buildings were erected in 1881. This town had, prior to the Conquest, a castle and a monastery; the latter eventually became a priory (1051), attached as a cell to Crowland. The river is navigable for vessels of 70 tons. Spalding is a railway centre, and trades in agricultural produce. Pop. 10,300.

Spandau (au as ow in now), a town and first-class fortress of Prussia, at the confluence of the Havel and the Spree, 8 miles by rail W. by N. of Berlin. The principal defence of the capital on that side, it has very strong fortifications. In the 'Julius tower' of the citadel is preserved in gold the Imperial War-fund of £6,000,000 (mainly derived from the French war indemnity) that the government, since 1871, keeps in reserve for a great war. Spandau is the seat of an arsenal, large government cannon-foundries, and factories for making gunpowder and other munitions of war. Pop. 85,000, including a garrison of nearly 4000 men.

Spanish Main (i.e. main-land), a name formerly given to the Spanish provinces on those coasts of South and Central America, which are contiguous to the Caribbean Sea. The name, however, is often applied to that sea itself.

Spanish Town. See Jamaica.

Sparta, or Lacedæmon, ancient capital of Laconia, and most famous city of the Peloponnesus, was situated on the right bank of the Eurotas, 20 miles from the sea, in a plain shut in by mountains, of which that on the west side, Mount Taygetus, rises to 8000 feet. The growth of the town of Misthra, 2 miles SW. of Sparta, in the 14th and 15th centuries A.D., led to the total desertion of the more ancient city; but the modern town of Sparti (pop. 5000), founded in 1836, occupies part of the site of old Sparta, and is again capital of the province of Laconia.

Spartanburg, a town of South Carolina, 93 miles by rail NNW. of Columbia. Here is the Wofford (Methodist; 1853) College. Pop. 17,500.

Spean (Spane), a river of Inverness-shire, running 20½ miles W. to the Lochy.

Speier. See Spires.

Spencer, a town of Massachusetts, 64 miles W. by S. of Boston, with manufactures of boots and woollens. Pop. 7000.

Spencer Gulf, a deep inlet (180 long by 90 wide) on the coast of South Australia, between Eyre's Peninsula and Yorke Peninsula.

Spennymoor, a town of Durham, 4 miles NE. of Bishop Auckland, with iron-foundries and coal-pits. Pop. 18,000.

Spey (Spay), a river of Scotland, rising at an altitude of 1500 feet above sea-level and running 107 miles NE. through or along the boundary of Inverness, Elgin, and Banff shires, until it falls into the Moray Firth at Kingston between Lossiemouth and Portknockie. The Dulnain and Avon are its principal tributaries. The salmon-fisheries, belonging to the Duke of Richmond, are at its mouth, above which comparatively few fish penetrate. On its banks are Kingussie, Aviemore, Grantown-on-Spey, Aberlour, Rothes, Fochabers, Garmouth, and Kingston. In its lower course it is said to have the swiftest current of all the large rivers in Britain, and is subject to sudden and violent freshets, resulting at times in disastrous inundations. See Sir Thomas Dick Lauder's Moray Floods (1830); and A. E. Knox, Autumns on the Spey (1882).

Speyer. See Spires.

Spezzia (Ital. Spezia; pron. Spet'sia), the principal naval port of Italy, stands near the head of a deep and commodious bay, 56 miles SE. of Genoa by rail. A breakwater (1860), 2400 feet long, covers the entrance; whilst formidable batteries (supplemented by torpedo appliances) bristle on the hills that overlook the bay and on the island of Palmeria, which guards its entrance. At this great national arsenal the Italians have built their large warships, and have their ship-repairing yards and docks, naval victualling yards, and store-houses (partly also at San Bartolomeo, on the opposite shore of the bay). There are also large barracks, a military hospital, schools of navigation, an iron-foundry, and manufactures of cables, sail-cloth, and white-lead. The beauty of the bay and the lovely climate cause Spezzia to be much frequented as a seaside-resort. It was on the shores of its bay that Shelley spent his last months, and here Charles Lever was consul for ten years. Pop. 66,000.

Spezzia (or Spetsai; anc. Pityussa), a Greek island at the entrance to the Gulf of Nauplia. Area, 6½ sq. m.; pop. 7000, nearly all in the town of Spezzia, which has a good harbour.

Spice Islands. See Moluccas.

Spicheren (Spihh'er-en), or Speichern, a village on the frontiers of Prussia and Lorraine, 2 miles S. of Saarbrück. Here on 6th August 1870 the Germans defeated the French.

Spielberg. See Brünn.

Spilsby, a market-town of Lincolnshire, 19 miles by rail NE. of Boston, stands on the edge of the Wolds. The church contains interesting monuments of the Willoughby family (1348–1610), and the market-place has a bronze statue of Sir John Franklin, a native of the town. Pop. 1500.

Spinazzola (Spinat'sola), a city of Southern Italy, 30 miles SW. of Bari. Pop. 12,000.

Spires (Ger. Speier), the capital of the Bavarian Palatinate, stands on the left bank of the Rhine, 19 miles S. of Mannheim. The red sandstone Romanesque cathedral was begun by Conrad II. in 1030 and finished in 1061; it suffered from fire in the 12th, 13th, and 16th centuries, and in 1689 was stripped to the bare walls and even set fire to by the French, who also exhumed and scattered the bones of eight German emperors. Reconstructed in 1782, it was again desecrated by the French in 1794, rebuilt in 1797–1822, and repaired in 1908. The interior walls are covered with more than thirty large frescoes; and statues of the eight emperors (1858) adorn the vestibule. The town itself was also demolished by the French in 1689, and having been rebuilt since then, has broad though irregular streets, with very few ancient buildings, except the gateway or clock-tower, dating from before 1246, and a few fragments of the imperial palace, in which several diets were held—one that of 1529, at which the Reformers first became known as Protestants. There is some industry in cloth, paper, tobacco, sugar, &c. Pop. 23,000. The Augusta Nemetum and Noviomagus of the Romans, but renamed Spira from the 7th c., Spires in the 13th became a free imperial city. Between 1801 and 1814 it was the capital of a dep. of France, and in 1815 it passed to Bavaria.

Spitalfields, a poor district of north-east London, in the Tower Hamlets, derives its name from the hospital of St Mary, founded there in 1197. The manufacture of silk was established in Spitalfields by emigrants from France after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685).

Spithead, a celebrated roadstead on the south coast of England, and a favourite rendezvous of the British navy, is the eastern division—the Solent (q.v.) being the western—of the strait that separates the Isle of Wight from the mainland. Protected from all winds except those from the south-east, it receives its name from the 'Spit,' a sandbank stretching south from the Hampshire shore for 3 miles; and it is 14 miles long by 4 miles in average breadth. Here in 1797 the sailors of the Channel Fleet mutinied for more liberal pay and allowances, which were granted to them. Spithead has been strongly defended since 1864 by fortifications completing those of Portsmouth (q.v.).

Spittal. See Berwick-on-Tweed.

Spitzbergen, better Spitsbergen, a group of Arctic islands, 400 m. N. of Norway, consisting of West Spitzbergen (15,260 sq. m.), North-east Land (4040 sq. m.), Stans Foreland (2210 sq. m.), the three islands called King Charles Land or Wiche Island (also identified with Gillis Land), Barents Land, Prince Charles Foreland, and several smaller islands and clusters of islets. The whole is icebound, and there are magnificent glaciers on the eastern shores, especially Dickson's glacier on North-east Land, 150 miles long. A thick ice-sheet covers the interior of the larger islands; but several sharp peaks—whence the name (meaning 'needle-mountains')—project above it and are nearly 2000 feet high; others on Prince Charles Foreland are almost 5000 feet. The shores of West Spitzbergen are deeply indented with fjords, two of which almost cut the island in two. The north-west shores of North-east Land are also very much broken. The vegetation is very scanty; except for the polar willow and a couple of berry-bushes, it consists principally of saxifrages and mosses, on which feed large herds of reindeer. The arctic fox and polar bear are the only other land animals, though there are vast swarms of sea-fowl. From the 16th to the 20th century whalers have come in summer, but whales, seals, and walruses are reduced in numbers. During the 20th century coal-mining, especially on Advent Bay, has been developed. Other minerals have been worked. The islands are visited by tourists and Norwegian hunters. They were discovered by Barents in 1596. Spitzbergen is a neutral territory, administered jointly (since 1912) by Russia, Norway, and Sweden. See books by Sir W. M. Conway (1897 and 1906).

Splügen, a pass (6946 feet) in the Grisons, connects the valley of the Farther Rhine with that of a tributary of the Adda.

Spokane (Spokan'), the second city of Washington, on the Spokane River, by the Union Pacific 481 miles NE. of Portland, Oregon, with a great lumber trade and various manufactures. It is a great mining centre. Pop. (1880) 350; now 104,400.

Spoleto (Spolay'to; Lat. Spoletium), an archiepiscopal city in central Italy, on a rocky hill, 75 miles by rail N. by E. of Rome. It has a citadel, dating from the days of the Goths, a Victor Emanuel monument (1892), and a fine cathedral, with frescoes by Lippo Lippi. Water is brought in by a 7th-century aqueduct, 270 feet high and 680 long. Pop. 10,000.

Spondinig. See STELVIO.

Sporades. See ARCHIPELAGO.

Spottsylvania Courthouse, a small village of Virginia, 55 miles N. by W. of Richmond, the scene, in 1864, of an indecisive battle.

Spree (Spray), a sluggish river of Prussia, rises in the east of Saxony, on the Bohemian border, and winds 227 miles N. and W. to the Havel at Spandau, passing Bautzen, Kottbus, and Berlin.

Springfield. See GRETNA.

Springfield, (1) the capital of Illinois, 185 miles by rail SW. of Chicago, at the meeting-point of seven railways. It possesses a handsome federal building, a state arsenal, two colleges, and one of the largest state capitols in the Union (of marble, 385 feet long by 296 wide; cost $5,000,000). It has coal-mines, iron-rolling mills and foundries, a watch-factory, and flour, woollen, paper, and planing mills. Springfield, which became the capital in 1837, was the home of Abraham Lincoln, who is buried in the beautiful Oak Ridge cemetery, in the crypt of a granite obelisk (1874), which cost $264,000. The population is about 51,700.—(2) A thriving city of Massachusetts, capital of Hampden county, on the Connecticut River's left bank, 99 miles by rail W. by S. of Boston and 25 N. of Hartford. The river is crossed by five bridges to West Springfield (pop. 10,000), and four railways meet here. The public buildings include a cathedral, city hall, granite court-house, and a railway station which cost $700,000. Among the factories are the U. S. Armoury (since 1794), foundries, car-works, and manufactories of cottons and woollens, paper, machinery, furniture, trunks, buttons, needles, spectacles, locks, pistols, skates, picture-frames, organs, and jewellery. The town was settled in 1635. Pop. 90,000.—(3) Capital of Greene county, Missouri, 232 miles by rail WSW. of St Louis, with machine-shops, car-works, and large cotton and woollen factories. Here is Drury College (Congregational; 1873). Near Springfield was fought the battle of Wilson's Creek, 10th August 1861. Pop. 35,200.—(4) Capital of Clark county, Ohio, on Lagonda Creek and Mad River, 80 miles by rail NE. of Cincinnati. Six railways meet here. The city contains the Wittenberg College (Lutheran; 1845), and handsome county and municipal buildings. It manufactures farm machinery, bicycles, sewing-machines, iron fences, paper, &c. Pop. 47,000.

Spurn Head, a promontory stretching 2½ miles into the mouth of the Humber (q.v.), and forming the south-eastern extremity of Yorkshire. It has a lighthouse. It seems to have been formed since the beginning of the 16th century by the southward drift of shingle. The once notable port of Ravenspur, close by, is washed away. See books on the lost towns by Boyle (1889) and Sheppard (1912).

Squillace (Skwillah'tchay), a small cathedral town (pop. 3000) of Calabria, on the site of the anc. Scylacium, 12 miles SW. of Catanzaro by rail, and 3 miles inland from the Gulf of Squillace.

Srinagar (Sreenagur'), or CASHMERE, the capital of the native state of Cashmere (q.v.) in Northern India, stands in a lovely valley of the Himalayas on the Jhelum, at an elevation of 5276 feet. Pop. 126,000.

Srirangam. See SERINGHAM.

Srivillipatur, a town in the NW. of Tinnevelli district, in South India. Pop. 26,400.

Staaten Island. See STATEN ISLAND.

Stade (Shtâh'deh), an ancient town of Hanover, 22 miles W. by N. of Hamburg. Pop. 11,000.

Staffa (Scand., 'pillar-island'), a celebrated islet on the west of Scotland, lies 4 miles SW. of Ulva, 6 N. by E. of Iona, and 54 W. of Oban. It forms an oval uneven tableland, rising at its highest to 144 feet above the water, 1½ mile in circumference, and 71 acres in area. In the north-east is a landing-place; but elsewhere the coast is girt with cliffs 84 to 112 feet high. The most remarkable feature of the island is Fingal's or the Great Cave, the entrance to which is formed by columnar basaltic ranges, supporting a lofty arch. The entrance is 42 feet wide, and 66 feet high, and the length of the cave is 227 feet. The floor of this marvellous chamber is the sea. First described (in Pennant's Tour) by Sir Joseph Banks, after a visit in 1772, Staffa has since been frequently visited—among others by Faujas de St Fond, Wordsworth, Keats, Scott, Mendelssohn, Tennyson, and Queen Victoria.

Stafford, the county town of Staffordshire, on the left bank of the Sow, 3 miles above its junction with the Trent, and 25 miles SSE. of Crewe, 29 NNW. of Birmingham, and 133 NW. of London. St Mary's Church, formerly collegiate, is a good cruciform structure, with an octagonal tower. Transition Norman to Decorated in style, it was restored by Scott in 1844–47 at a cost of £30,000, and in 1878 received a bust of Stafford's chief worthy, Izaak Walton, who was baptised in its font. St Chad's, Norman, was very thoroughly restored during 1855–85; and there are also King Edward's grammar-school (1550; rebuilt 1862), the town-hall (1798), a free library (1882), the William Salt Library (1874), the Clement Wragge Museum, the infirmary (1766), the county lunatic asylum (1818), &c. Stafford Castle, finely situated on an eminence outside the town, which commands a magnificent view, is an unfinished castellated pile. It was built by Sir G. Jerningham in 1810–15, successor to a Saxon fortress of the Princess Ethelfleda, and to a later Norman stronghold, which was finally taken by the parliamentarians in 1643, and demolished. Boot and shoe making is the staple industry, and Stafford is an important railway centre. Chartered by King John, it returned two members from Edward I.'s reign till 1885, when the representation was reduced to one and the parliamentary boundary extended. Pop. (1851) 11,829; (1871) 14,437; (1911) 23,383. See works by Masfen (1852) and Cherry (1890).

Staffordshire, a west midland county of England, bounded by the counties of Cheshire, Derby, Leicester, Warwick, Worcester, and Salop. Measuring 54 by 35 miles, it has an area of 1158 sq. m. or 741,318 acres. The only hilly district is in the north, where the wild 'Moorlands,' the southern extremity of the Pennine range, extend from NW. to SE. in long ridges, separated by deeply-cut valleys, and subside as they near the valley of the Trent. Several points exceed 1500 feet above sea-level, but Axe Edge Hill (1756), falls just within Derbyshire. The rest of the county is gently undulating, with the low upland of Cannock Chase in the centre. The Trent, flowing first south-eastward through the interior, and then north-eastward along the Derbyshire border, is the chief river, and receives the Sow, Tame, Blythe, and Dove. In the north and south are the Pottery and Dudley coalfields, which, besides containing nearly 600 collieries, yield also (especially the northern one) vast quantities of ironstone. The climate is cold and humid; and, though more than four-fifths of the area is arable, much of the soil is cold and clayey, and agriculture is in rather a backward condition. In the 'Potteries' of North Staffordshire, embracing Stoke-on-Trent, Newcastle-under-Lyme, &c., most extensive manufactures of china and earthenware are carried on; and in the 'Black Country' in the south, with Wolverhampton and Walsall, iron is very largely manufactured. The Burton breweries are world-famous. There is a perfect network of railways and canals. Staffordshire, which is mainly in the diocese of Lichfield, contains five hundreds and 273 parishes. It has been divided since 1885 into seven divisions, each returning one member—Leek, Burton, West, North-west, Lichfield, Kingswinford, and Handsworth—besides eight parliamentary boroughs. The county boroughs are Burton-upon-Trent, Smethwick, Stoke-on-Trent, Walsall, West Bromwich, and Wolverhampton; the other municipal boroughs, Lichfield, Newcastle-under-Lyme, Stafford, Tamworth, and Wednesbury. Pop. (1801) 242,693; (1841) 509,472; (1881) 981,009; (1911) 1,279,649. Staffordshire has no great wealth of antiquities, and has been the scene of no battles more important than Blore Heath (1459) and Hopton Heath (1643). Among its natives have been Lord Anson, Ashmole, Dr Johnson, Thomas Newton, Cardinal Pole, Earl St Vincent, Izaak Walton, and Josiah Wedgwood.

Staines, a picturesque town of Middlesex, on the left bank of the Thames, 6 miles SE. of Windsor and 19 WSW. of London (35½ by river). Named from the 'London Stone' (1280) at the county boundary, Staines has vast water-works, and a granite bridge by Rennie (1832); and near it are Runnimede, Egham, and Cooper's Hill. Pop. 7000.

Stair, an Ayrshire parish, 6½ miles ENE. of Ayr, gives the title of Earl to the Dalrymples.

Staithes, a Yorkshire coast-village, 10 miles NW. of Whitby. Captain Cook lived here as a boy.

Stalbridge, a Dorset town, 6 miles E. by N. of Sherborne. Pop. 1400.

Stalybridge, a cotton town of Cheshire, occupying a hilly site on both banks of the Tame, 7½ miles E. by N. of Manchester. Dating only from 1776, it has huge factories for the spinning of cotton yarns and calico-weaving, iron-foundries, and machine-shops, a town-hall (1831), market-buildings (1867), a mechanics' institute (1861), an Oddfellows' hall (1878), and, between it and Ashton-under-Lyne to the west, the Stamford Park (1873). It was made a municipal borough in 1857, a parliamentary borough (partly in Lancashire) in 1867. Pop. of the former, 26,500; of the latter, 45,900.

Stamboul (Stambool'). See CONSTANTINOPLE.

Stamford, a municipal borough chiefly in Lincolnshire, but partly also in Northamptonshire, on the Welland, 12 miles WNW. of Peterborough. Hengist is said to have here defeated the Picts and Scots in 449, and Stamford thereafter is notable as one of the Danish 'five boroughs,' as having been visited by at least thirteen sovereigns (from Edward the Elder in 922 to Queen Victoria in 1844), for the persecution of its Jews (1190), as having between 1266 and 1334 only missed becoming a rival to Oxford, for its colony of Flemish Protestants (1572), as the birthplace of the earliest provincial newspaper, the Stamford Mercury (1695), and for its famous bull-running on 13th November from King John's time until 1839. It has lost ten of its sixteen churches, an Eleanor cross, two castles, six religious houses, and two hospitals. Existing edifices are St Mary's, with a fine spire, All Saints, with a fine tower and steeple, St Martin's with Lord Burghley's grave and, in the churchyard, Daniel Lambert's, a town-hall (1777), corn exchange (1859), literary institute (1842), bridge (1849), Browne's Hospital (15th century), and boys' and girls' high schools (1874–76). Burghley House (q.v.) stands close 'by Stamford town.' The trade and industries are mainly agricultural. Chartered by Edgar in 972, and afterwards by Edward IV., Stamford was a parliamentary borough, but lost one of its two members in 1867 and the other in 1885. For good services rendered by the inhabitants at the battle of Loose-coat-field (1469) the town seal bears the royal arms. Population, 10,000. See works by Butcher (1646), Howgrave (1726), Peck (1727; new ed. 1785), Drakard (1822), Sharp (1847), Walcott (1867), and Nevinson (1879).

Stamford, a town of Connecticut, on Long Island Sound, 33 miles by rail NE. of New York. It has a handsome town-hall; and the hills around are embellished with the summer residences of well-to-do New Yorkers. Settled in 1641, it has iron and bronze foundries, and manufactories of hats, drugs, sashes, and Yale locks. Population, 25,000.

Stamford Bridge, a Yorkshire village, on the Derwent, 9¼ miles NE. of York. Here Harold routed Harold Haarfager (1066).

Stampalia. See ASTROPALIA.

Standerton, capital of a district in the Transvaal, 110 miles SE. of Pretoria, with two bridges across the Vaal. Pop. 5000.

Stanhope, a town on the Wear, 26 miles W. of Durham by rail. Its rectory, once known as the 'golden rectory,' was held by Bishop Butler (1725–40). The famous lead-mines are now much less profitable than of old. Pop. 2000.

Stanislawow (w's as v's), or STANISLAU, an Austrian town in Galicia, 87 miles SE. of Lemberg. Pop. 33,000 (about one-half Jews).

Stanley, a town 8 miles W. of Durham; pop. 23,300; (2) a town 2 miles NNE. of Wakefield; pop. 13,600; (3) another 7 miles NW. of Perth; (4) the capital of the Falkland Islands (q.v).

Stanley Pool, a lake-like expansion of the Congo (q.v.), 25 miles long by 16 wide.

Stanovoi Mountains. See SIBERIA.

Stanton Drew, a Somerset parish, 7 miles S. of Bristol, with prehistoric stone circles.

Stanton Harcourt, the ancient seat of the Harcourts, 6 miles W. of Oxford, with a curious kitchen and memories of Pope.

Starcross, a Devon watering-place, on the Exe estuary, 8 miles SSE. of Exeter.

Stargard, the chief town of Further Pomerania, Prussia, on the Ihna, 22 miles by rail E. by S. of Stettin. Pop. 27,500.

Starodoub (ou as oo), an Ukraine town, Russia, 120 miles NE. of Tchernigoff. Pop. 12,000.

Start Point, a projection of the coast of Devon, 8 miles S. of Dartmouth, forming the south-eastern extremity of the county, has a lighthouse.

Stassfurt, a town of Prussian Saxony, 20 miles SSW. of Magdeburg, with large stores of salt and kainite (whence the main potash-supplies of the world are derived). It has machine-shops, boiler-works, and other industries. Pop. 20,000.

Staten Island (Stat'ten), (1) separated from Long Island by the Narrows and from New Jersey by the Kill van Kull and Staten Island Sound, constitutes the borough of Richmond, New York city. Area, 55 sq. m.; population, 86,000.—(2) An Argentinian island separated from Tierra del Fuego by Le Maire Strait. Long (45 miles) and narrow, it has steep coasts penetrated by deep fiords, and rises to 3000 feet. Snow covers it most of the year. It was named in 1616 after the States-general of Holland.

Staubbach, FALL OF. See LAUTERBRUNNEN.

Staunton, capital of Augusta county, Virginia, in the Shenandoah valley, 136 miles by rail WNW. of Richmond. Here are the state lunatic, deaf-mute, and blind asylums, large iron-works, and flour and planing mills. Pop. 10,600.

Stavanger (Stah'vang-er), the chief town of SW. Norway, on the S. side of Bukken Fjord, 100 miles S. of Bergen. It has two harbours, and derives its importance from the fisheries of the adjacent coast. Dating back to the 9th c. at least, it has been often destroyed by fire and is now quite a modern place. The Gothic cathedral was founded by an English bishop (Reinald) in the 11th century. Of late years Stavanger has become a favourite tourists' rendezvous, sometimes 5000 stopping here in a year. Pop. 37,000.

Staveley, a Derbyshire township, 4 miles NE. of Chesterfield. Pop. 12,000.

Stavro'pol, a town on the northern slopes of the Caucasus. Pop. 55,000.—Area of government, 20,650 sq. m.; pop. 1,230,000.

Stawell, a town of Victoria, Australia, 125 miles WNW. of Melbourne, with gold-mines. Pop. 5000.

Steelton, a borough of Pennsylvania, on the Susquehanna, 4 miles SE. of Harrisburg, with steel-works. Pop. 14,000.

Steinkerk, or STEENKERKE (Stīne-kerk or Stayn-ker-keh), a Belgian village, 5 miles N. of Soignies. William III. was defeated here by the French on 3d August 1692.

Stellaland, a short-lived South African republic, formed in 1882 by Boers. In 1885 Britain incorporated it in Bechuanaland (q.v.).

Stellenbosch, a South African town (pop. 6000), in a fertile vine-clad valley, 25 miles E. of Capetown by rail, with Victoria College.

Stellingen, a village of Holstein adjoining Hamburg, with Hagenbeck's zoological park.

Stelvio Pass (Ger. Stilfserjoch), the highest carriage-road across the Alps (9042 feet), in Tyrol, forming part of the great road (1825) between Milan and Innsbruck.

Stendal, a town of Prussian Saxony, 36 miles NNE. of Magdeburg, has a Gothic cathedral (1420–24), a statue of Winckelmann (a native), railway workshops, &c. Pop. 27,000.

Stennis, a parish in Orkney, 4 miles NE. of Stromness, with a sea-loch of that name, and two celebrated stone circles, the larger 340 feet in diameter, with stones 3 to 14½ feet high.

Stepney, a London metropolitan borough; pop. 279,800. It is also one of the parliamentary divisions of Tower Hamlets.

Sterling, a city of Illinois, on Rock River, 109 miles W. of Chicago. It has factories, which produce iron, farm implements, barbed wire, pumps, windmills, wagons, paper, &c. Pop. 7500.

Sternberg, a town of Austria, 12 miles by rail N. of Olmütz. Pop. 15,200.

Stettin (Stet-teen'), capital of the Prussian province of Pomerania, and a busy port, stands on the Oder, 30 miles from the Baltic and 60 by rail (120 by river and canal) NE. of Berlin. Among its buildings are the Gothic church of St Peter (founded 1124), the large church of St James (14th century), the royal palace (1575), two ornamental arches, a hospital, town-house, theatre, &c. The strong fortifications were removed in 1874; since then the ground on which they stood has been rapidly built over, so that Stettin now forms virtually one large town with Bredow, Grabow, and Züllchow. The population rose from 17,154 in 1871 to 116,139 in 1890, and—with the suburbs—to 237,400 in 1910. Its industries include shipbuilding, oil-refining, and the manufacture of cement, sugar, paper, spirits, soap and candles, matches, chemicals, flour, sewing-machines, &c. Stettin was the seat of a princely dynasty, 1107–1637; was occupied by Sweden, 1648–1720; by the French, 1806–13.

Steubenville (Stew'ben-vil), capital of Jefferson county, Ohio, on the Ohio River, 68 miles below Pittsburgh (by railway 43), with blast-furnaces, rolling-mills, machine and railway shops, and manufactories of white-lead, paper, glass, woollens, flour, beer, &c. There are coal-mines near by, and natural gas is plentiful. Fort Steuben was built here in 1787. Pop. 22,400.

Stevenage, a town of Hertfordshire, 4 miles SE. of Hitchin by rail, with an old parish church and a grammar-school (1558). Straw-plait is manufactured. Pop. 5000.

Stevenson's Road. See LIVINGSTONIA, TANGANYIKA.

Stevens Point, a town of Wisconsin, on the Wisconsin River, 161 miles by rail NW. of Milwaukee, with mills and a lumber trade. Pop. 8700.

Stevenston, a town of Ayrshire, ¾ mile inland, and 28 miles SW. of Glasgow. Cotton and silk weaving used to be the staple industries, but it now depends on the neighbouring collieries, ironworks, chemical works, and Nobel's explosives factory. Pop. 7000.

Stewart Island. See NEW ZEALAND.

Stewarton, a town of Ayrshire, on Annick Water, 5½ miles N. by W. of Kilmarnock. Its specialty is the Scotch bonnet manufacture; but it also carries on carpet-weaving, spindle-making, &c. Pop. 3000.

Stewartstown, a Tyrone market-town, 7 miles NE. of Dungannon. Pop. 600.

Steyer (Stī'er), a town of Upper Austria, at the confluence of the Steyer and Enns, 36 miles by rail S. by E. of Linz, is the chief seat of the iron and steel manufactures of Austria, turning out firearms, cutlery, &c. Pop. 18,000.

Steyning (Stain'ing), a Sussex town, 1 mile W. of the river Adur and 4½ miles N. of Shoreham. Till 1832 it returned two members. Pop. 1700.

Stillorgan, a village, 5 miles SE. of Dublin.

Stillwater, capital of Washington county, Minnesota, on the navigable St Croix River (which here expands into a narrow lake), 18 miles by rail NE. of St Paul. It has a large lumber trade, and contains sawmills, a foundry, and flour-mills. Pop. 10,200.

Stilton, a parish (pop. 500) of N. Huntingdonshire, 6 miles SW. of Peterborough. It gives name to the well-known cheese, now manufactured elsewhere.

Stinchar (Stin'shar), an Ayrshire stream, flowing 30 miles to the sea at Ballantrae.

Stirling, the county town of Stirlingshire, stands on the south bank of the winding Forth, 36 miles NW. of Edinburgh and 29 NNE. of Glasgow. Like Edinburgh, to which in its main features it bears a striking resemblance, it no doubt owes its origin to the strong natural fortress of its Castle Hill, which rises gradually from the east to a height of 420 feet above the sea or 340 above the plain, and fronts the west with a steep precipitous wall of basaltic rock. The Castle, which commands magnificent views of the Grampians, the Ochils, and the 'Links of Forth,' dates from immemorial antiquity, though few, if any, of the existing buildings are earlier than the days of the Stewart sovereigns, who often kept court here. These include the Douglas room (where the Earl of Douglas was stabbed by James II., 1452), James III.'s parliament-hall (now a barrack-room), James V.'s palace, and James VI.'s chapel (now a store-room). Stirling has many other objects of interest, as Argyll's Lodging (1630, since 1799 a military hospital); ruined Mar's Work (c. 1570); the parish church (in 1656 divided into two); the colossal statue of Bruce (1877); the new cemetery, with half-a-dozen statues of Reformers and Covenanters and a marble group of the Wigtown martyrs; Cowane's Hospital or the Guildhall (1637); the King's Knot and King's Park; the Mote or Heading Hill; the old four-arch bridge (c. 1400—the 'key of the Highlands'); Robert Stevenson's new bridge (1832); and the Smith Institute (1874), with picture-gallery, reading-room, library, and museum, where now is preserved the 'Stirling Jug' (1497), the standard of the old Scots pint. Other modern edifices are the County Buildings (1875), the public hall (1883), and the High School (1855–89). In the neighbourhood are Bannockburn (q.v.), the ruins of Cambuskenneth Abbey (q.v.), and the Abbey Craig (q.v.). Stirling manufactures tartans, tweeds, carpets, agricultural implements, &c. A royal burgh as early as 1119, it unites with Dunfermline, Culross, Inverkeithing, and Queensferry to return one member. Pop. (1851) 12,837; (1911) 21,200. Stirling (formerly Stryvelyne or Estrivelin, and also Snowdoun) has a wealth of historic memories —the death of Alexander I. and William the Lion; Wallace's victory of Stirling Bridge (1297); the great siege of the castle by Edward I. (1304); the birth of James III.; the coronation of Queen Mary; the baptism and coronation of James VI.; the slaughter of the Regent Lennox (1571); the birth of Prince Henry (1594); the capture of the castle by Monk (1651); and its unsuccessful siege by the Jacobites (1746). See History of the Chapel Royal of Stirling (Grampian Club, 1882), and Charters of Stirling (Glasgow, 1884).

Stirlingshire, a midland county of Scotland, forming the border-land between Highlands and Lowlands, is bounded by Perth, Clackmannan, Linlithgow, Lanark, and Dumbarton shires. With a maximum length and breadth of 46 and 22 miles, it has an area of 451 sq. m., or 288,842 acres, of which 3000 are foreshore and 8000 water. The Forth traces much of the northern and all the north-eastern boundary; on the western lies Loch Lomond; and other lakes and streams belonging partly or wholly to Stirlingshire are Lochs Katrine and Arklet, and the Avon, Carron, Bannock, Endrick, and Blane. Ben Lomond, in the north-west, attains 3192 feet; and lesser elevations are the Gargunnock Hills (1591 feet), Kilsyth Hills (1393), Campsie Fells (1894), and Fintry Hills (1676). A considerable part of Stirlingshire is occupied by the carses of Stirling and Falkirk, which have in great measure been reclaimed from unproductive moss. About 40 per cent. of the whole area of the county is in cultivation; woods cover 14,241 acres. Coal and ironstone are largely mined; and there are the great ironworks of Carron and Falkirk, besides manufactures of woollens, cotton, chemicals, &c. The chief towns are Stirling, Falkirk, Kilsyth, Denny, and Grangemouth. The county returns one member. Pop. (1801) 50,825; (1841) 82,057; (1911) 161,991. Battles were fought at Stirling Bridge, Falkirk (1298 and 1745), Bannockburn, Sauchieburn, and Kilsyth.

Stobs, an estate in Roxburgh, 5 miles S. of Hawick, bought by government in 1900 for a camp. At Stobs Castle Lord Heathfield was born.

Stockbridge, a Hampshire market-town, on the Anton or Test, 8 miles W. by S. of Andover.

Till 1832 it returned two members; Steele at one time was its representative. It has a well-known racecourse and training stables. Pop. 900.

Stockholm (l pronounced), the capital of Sweden, stands on several islands and the adjacent mainland, between a bay of the Baltic and Lake Mälar, in a situation that is accounted one of the most picturesque in Europe. Its nucleus is an island in mid-channel called 'the Town;' on it stand the imposing royal palace (1697–1754); the chief church (St Nicholas), in which the kings are crowned; the House of the Nobles (1648–70); the town-house; the ministries of the kingdom; and the principal wharf, a magnificent granite quay, fronting east. Immediately W. of the central island lies the Knights' Island (Riddarholm); it is almost entirely occupied with public buildings as the old Houses of Parliament; the old Franciscan church, in which all the later sovereigns of Sweden have been buried; the royal archives; and the chief law-courts. N. of these two islands lie the handsomely built districts of Norrmalm, separated from them by a narrow channel, in which is an islet with the new Houses of Parliament. In Norrmalm are the National Museum (1850–65), with valuable prehistoric collections, coins, paintings, sculptures; the principal theatres; the Academy of Fine Arts (1735); the barracks; the Hop Garden, with the Royal Library (1870–76), 250,000 vols. and 8000 MSS., and with the statue (1885) of Linnæus; the Academy of Sciences (1739); the Museum of Northern Antiquities (1873); the Observatory, &c. Ship Island (Skeppsholm), immediately east of 'the Town' island, is the headquarters of the Swedish navy, and is connected with a smaller island on the south-east, that is crowned with a citadel. Beyond these again, and farther to the east, lies the beautiful island of the Zoological Gardens. Immediately south of 'the Town' island is the extensive district of Södermalm, the houses of which climb up the steep slopes that rise from the water's edge. Handsome bridges connect the central islands with the northern and southern districts; quick little steamboats go to the beautiful islands in Lake Mälar on the west, and eastward towards the Baltic Sea (40 miles distant). Sugar, tobacco, silks and ribbons, candles, linen, cotton, and leather are produced, and there are large iron-foundries and machine-shops. Though the water approaches are frozen up during winter, Stockholm imports wheat and rye, rice, flour, herrings, oils and oilcake, wine and spirits, &c., and exports iron and steel, oats, and tar. Stockholm was founded by Birger Jarl in 1255, and grew to be the capital only in modern times. Pop. (1800) 75,500; (1850) 93,000; (1878) 156,677; (1910) 342,986. The principal events in the history of the city have been the sieges by Queen Margaret of Denmark (1389), battles in the vicinity against the Danes, the capture of the place by Christian II. of Denmark in 1520, and his 'Blood Bath' of nobles and chief citizens.

Stockport, a parliamentary, municipal, and county borough of East Cheshire, 6 miles SSE. of Manchester and 37 E. of Liverpool. It is built on the slopes of a narrow gorge, where the Tame and the Goyt unite to form the Mersey, which is spanned by the viaduct (1840) of the London and North-western Railway, 111 feet high, and 625 yards long, as well as by several bridges. St Mary's Church was rebuilt in 1817, with the exception of its 14th-century chancel; and Stockport has also a market-hall (1851–61), mechanics' institute (1862), free library (1875), fine technical school (1890), huge Union Sunday-school (1806), grammar-school (1487; rebuilt 1832), infirmary (1832), the Vernon Park (1858), containing a museum, and, in St Peter's Square, a statue (1886) of Richard Cobden, who represented the borough from 1841 to 1847. Stockport was the site of a Roman station, and afterwards of a Norman castle, held till 1327 by the Earls of Chester, and taken by Prince Rupert in 1644, soon after which it was demolished by the parliament. In 1745 Prince Charles Edward passed through Stockport, which Bishop Pococke six years later describes as having 'a little manufacture of the Manchester linen, some woollen and ribands, and two silk-mills like those of Derby.' Since then it has grown to be a most important seat of the cotton industry, in spite of the machinery disturbances (1810–20), the strike of 1828–29, when the military were called out, and many persons wounded, the 'Plug Riots' (1840), and the cotton-famine (1861–64). Felt hats are also manufactured, and there are iron and brass foundries, engine and machine shops, breweries, &c. Stockport was constituted a parliamentary borough (returning two members) in 1832, a municipal borough in 1835, and a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1851) 53,835; (1881) 59,553; (1911) 108,682. See works by Butterworth (1827–28), Earwaker (East Cheshire, 1877), and Heginbotham (1877–78).

Stocksbridge, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 7½ miles NW. of Sheffield. Pop. 7000.

Stockton, capital of San Joaquin county, California, on a creek connected with the San Joaquin River, 103 miles E. by N. of San Francisco. It contains the state lunatic asylum, and manufactures ironware, paper, woollens, flour, soap, &c. Pop. 20,000.

Stockton-on-Tees, an important municipal and parliamentary borough and seaport in Durham, situate on the north side of the Tees, 4 miles from its mouth and 11 ENE. of Darlington, 4 WSW. of Middlesbrough, and 236 NNW. of London. The broad and handsome High Street is nearly a mile in length; and a new town, South Stockton or Thornaby-on-Tees (q.v.), included within the parliamentary boundary, in Yorkshire, has sprung up on the south bank of the river, the two being connected by an iron bridge of three arches (1887), which superseded a five-arch stone bridge of 1771, and cost over £80,000. The town has six churches, a Roman Catholic chapel (1842–70) by the elder Pugin, a town-hall, borough-hall (1852), an exchange, a theatre, large recreation grounds, and a public park opened by the Duke of York in October 1893. The Stockton Races, of some mark in the sporting world, are held annually in August. Shipbuilding, chiefly in iron and steel, is busily carried on; and blast-furnaces, foundries, engine-works, and extensive potteries and ironworks are in operation. Sail-cloth, ropes, linen, and diapers were at one time the staple industry; but their manufacture has been discontinued; and there are breweries, corn-mills, and spinning-mills. The exports are chiefly iron and earthenware; the imports corn, timber in deals, spars, &c., and bark. At Stockton the Tees is navigable for vessels of large tonnage; the navigation of the river has been much improved. Pop. of the municipal borough (1891) 49,708; (1911) 52,154; of parliamentary borough, including Thornaby, (1911) 76,619. Stockton suffered severely from the incursions of the Scots in the early part of the 14th century. Its moated castle was taken for the Parliament in 1644, and 'slighted and dismantled' in 1652, almost the last vestige being removed in 1865. At the Restoration it had only 120 houses, mostly built of clay. Since 1867 it sends one member to parliament. Ritson was a native. See DARLINGTON, and works by J. Brewster (1829), H. Heavisides (1865), and T. Richmond (1868).

Stoke-Poges (Pojis), a village of Buckinghamshire, 2 miles N. of Slough station. Gray's mother settled here in 1742; the beautiful churchyard is the scene of his Elegy, and in that churchyard he is buried. Pop. of parish, 1400.

Stokesley, a Yorkshire town, on the Leven, 9 miles SE. of Stockton-on-Tees. Pop. 1600.

Stoke-upon-Trent, a manufacturing town of Staffordshire, the capital of the 'Potteries,' on the Trent and the Trent-and-Mersey Canal, 15 miles SE. of Crewe, 2 E. of Newcastle-under-Lyme, and 16 N. of Stafford. It is a modern place, dating only from the last quarter of the 18th century, and has a parish church with Wedgwood's grave, a town-hall (1835), a market-hall (1883), a free library (1878), the Minton memorial building (1858), the Hartshill Infirmary (1868), public baths, and statues of Wedgwood, Minton, and Colin Minton Campbell. Its factories of porcelain, earthenware, encaustic tiles, and tesselated pavements are among the largest in the world; and the industries also include coal-mining, brick-making, and the manufacture of iron, engines, machinery, &c. The parliamentary borough, constituted in 1832, was much curtailed in 1885 and lost one of its two members; the municipal borough was incorporated in 1874, and in 1910 was united with Hanley, Burslem, Longton, Tunstall, and Fenton, in the county borough of Stoke-on-Trent. Pop., county borough, 234,534; parl., 99,323.

Stolberg, (1) a mining and manufacturing town of Rhenish Prussia, 10 miles by rail E. of Aix-la-Chapelle. It manufactures brass, iron, zinc, glass, &c. Pop. 15,000.—(2) A town at the S. base of the Harz Mountains, the centre of an old countship; pop. 2300.

Stolp, a Prussian town in Pomerania, on the river Stolp, 85 miles W. by N. of Danzig. It has a castle, iron-foundries, and machinery and amber manufactures. Pop. 34,000.

Stone, a Staffordshire town, on the Trent's left bank, 7 miles NNW. of Stafford and 7 S. of Stoke-upon-Trent. It has a town-hall (1869), a market-hall (1868), Alleyne's school (1558), remains of an Augustinian monastery, two modern convents, and manufactures of earthenware, boots, beer, leather, &c. Peter de Wint was a native. Pop. 5700.

Stonebyres Linn. See CLYDE.

Stonefield, an industrial town of Lanarkshire, 2½ miles NW. of Hamilton and 8 SE. of Glasgow. It was the scene of riots in February 1887. Pop. 10,000.

Stoneham, a town of Massachusetts, 9 miles N. of Boston. It has boot-factories. Pop. 7000.

Stoneha'ven (locally Stanehive'), a seaport and (since 1607) the county town of Kincardineshire, 16 miles SSW. of Aberdeen, is situated on a rocky bay at the mouth of Carron Water, which divides it into an Old and New Town. The harbour, formed since 1826, admits only small vessels; but the town (constituted a police-burgh in 1889) has herring and haddock fisheries. Population, 4300. See DUNNOTTAR.

Stonehenge (Saxon Stanhengist, 'the hanging stones'), in Wiltshire, on Salisbury Plain, 9 miles N. of Salisbury and 2 W. of Amesbury, is a circular group of gigantic standing stones, situated in the midst of a number of prehistoric barrows of the bronze age. The circle, which is 97·7 feet in diameter, occupies the central portion of an area of 360 feet in diameter, enclosed within an earthen rampart and ditch. It consists of two concentric circles enclosing two ellipses. The exterior circle, which is composed of pillar-stones of Tertiary sandstone, locally called 'sarsens,' set up at pretty regular intervals of about 4 feet apart, has been surmounted by a continuous line of imposts closely fitted to each other at the extremities, and having mortise-holes in their under sides, which receive tenons on the tops of the pillar-stones. The pillar-stones show generally about 13 feet of height above the ground, and the imposts are about 10 feet long, 3½ feet wide, and 2 feet 8 inches deep. Of this circle seventeen pillar-stones and six imposts retain their original position. About 9 feet within the exterior circle are the remains of a second circle of smaller undressed blocks or boulders of primitive rock, locally known as 'blue stones.' Within this inner circle, and separated from it by about the same distance, is an incomplete ellipse, nearly of horse-shoe form, with the open end facing the north-east, formed of five trilithons or groups of two immense pillar-stones supporting an impost. The central trilithon facing the open end of the ellipse is the largest, the pillar-stones being 22½ feet in height above ground, and the added height of the impost making the whole height of the trilithon 26½ feet. The other four, which stood facing each other, two and two on opposite sides of the ellipse, are somewhat smaller, and only two are now perfect. Within this ellipse is a smaller ellipse of the same form, but composed, like the second circle, of irregularly-shaped 'blue stones' without imposts, varying from 6 to 8 feet in height, and set at intervals of 5 to 6 feet. Though not mentioned by any Roman writer, or noticed by Gildas or Bede, Stonehenge, in the 12th c., is chronicled by Henry of Huntingdon as one of the four wonders of England, the other three being merely natural phenomena. It has been variously attributed to the Phœnicians, the Belgæ, the Druids, the Saxons, and the Danes. It has been called a temple of the sun, and of serpent-worship, a shrine of Buddha, a planetarium, &c. Recent authorities assign it to the bronze or late stone age, about 2000–1000 B.C. One of the uprights was blown down in 1900, and re-erected (in cement) next year. The whole is now fenced in, and looked after, as private property. See Lady Antrobus, Guide to Amesbury and Stonehenge (1901); and Lockyer, Stonehenge (new ed. 1909).

Stonehouse, a town of Lanarkshire, on Avon Water, 7¼ miles SSE. of Hamilton. Pop. 3200.

Stonehouse. See DEVONPORT.

Stone River. See MURFREESBOROUGH.

Stonington, a port of Connecticut, on the Atlantic, 14 miles E. of New London. It has a foundry, and tin-factories. Pop. 9000.

Stonyhurst, a great Roman Catholic college, in NE. Lancashire, 4 miles SW. of Clitheroe. The old home of the Shireburnes, it passed by marriage in 1754 to the Welds of Lulworth, and by them was granted in 1794 to the Jesuit seminary founded at St Omer in 1592 by Father Parsons, and thence transferred in 1762 to Bruges, in 1772 to Liége. The fine old house, dating from 1594, was much extended during 1810–78, the chapel being built in 1835. There are an observatory, a library of 40,000 vols., &c. Affiliated in 1840 to the University of London, Stonyhurst has now some 300 boys. See works by Hewitson (2d ed. 1878), an anonymous writer (1881), Rimmer (1884), Halt (1886), Shawcross (1894), and Father Gerard (1894).

Stony Stratford, a market-town of Bucks, on Watling Street and the Ouse, 8 miles NE. of Buckingham. It had an Eleanor cross till 1646, and suffered from fire in 1742. Pop. 2000.

Stormont. See PERTHSHIRE.

Stormontfield, a Tayside village, 4½ miles N. of Perth, with salmon-breeding ponds (1853).

Stor′noway, a seaport and important fishery-station in Lewis, the chief town of the Outer Hebrides, near the head of a spacious sea-loch, 59 miles N. by W. of Portree in Skye and 180 of Oban. The principal feature is Stornoway Castle, completed in 1870 by Sir James Matheson (1796–1878), at a cost, with the grounds, of £89,000. Pop. 3800.

Stour, (1) a river flowing 47 miles E. along the Suffolk and Essex boundary to the sea at Harwich.—(2) A river of Kent, flowing 40 miles, past Ashford and Canterbury to Pegwell Bay.—(3) A river of Oxford and Warwick shires, flowing 20 miles to the Avon, near Stratford-on-Avon.—(4) A river of Somerset, Dorset, and Hants, flowing 55 miles to the Avon at Christchurch.

Stourbridge, a market-town of Worcestershire, on the Stour, at the border of Staffordshire and the Black Country, 4½ miles S. by W. of Dudley and 12 W. by S. of Birmingham. The famous fireclay is said to have been discovered about 1555 by wandering glassmakers from Lorraine; and Stourbridge now has glass, earthenware, and firebrick works, besides manufactures of iron, nails, chains, leather, &c. The grammar-school (1552), at which Samuel Johnson passed a twelvemonth, was rebuilt in 1862; and there are also a corn exchange (1854), county court (1864), and mechanics' institute. Pop. (1851) 7847; (1881) 9737; (1911, urban district) 17,312.

Stourport, a town of Worcestershire, at the Stour's influx to the Severn, and the terminus of the Staffordshire and Worcestershire Canal, 14 miles by rail N. by W. of Worcester and 4 SSW. of Kidderminster. Dating from 1770, it is a clean, neat place, with manufactures of carpets, iron, glass, &c. Pop. 4400.

Stow, a Midlothian village, on the Gala's left bank, 6¾ miles N. of Galashiels. Pop. 500.

Stowe House, 3 miles NNW. of Buckingham, the seat of the Duke of Buckingham, and residence of the exiled Orleans family.

Stowey, NETHER, a Somerset village, 7½ miles WNW. of Bridgwater, with memories of Thomas Poole and Coleridge.

Stowmarket, a Suffolk urban district, on the Gipping, 12 miles NW. of Ipswich. It has a fine flint-work church (chiefly Decorated), with a tower and spire 120 feet high, an iron-foundry, malting, stay-making, and chemical and guncotton works—a disastrous explosion here in August 1871 cost twenty-three lives. Pop. 4200. For its memories of Milton, Burkitt, Crabbe, and Godwin, see Hollingsworth's History of Stowmarket (1844).

Stow-on-the-Wold, a Gloucestershire town, 4¼ miles SSW. of Moreton-in-the-Marsh. Pop. 1300.

Strabane (Stra-bâhn′), a Tyrone market-town, on the Mourne, 14 miles by rail S. by W. of Londonderry. It has fine R. C. (1892–95), Episcopalian, and Presbyterian churches; a large convent on the hill behind, and celebrated flax and grain markets. Pop. 5100.

Stradbroke, a Suffolk town, Bishop Grosseteste's birthplace, 5½ miles E. of Eye. Pop. 1000.

Straits Settlements, a British colony in the East Indies, consists (since 1867) of the three settlements of Singapore, Malacca, and Penang, to which Keeling (or Cocos) Islands (since 1886), Christmas Island (1889), and Labuan (1906) have been added. These three have been incorporated in the settlement of Singapore. See the respective articles. The total area is 1542 sq. m., and the total pop. 714,000, more than half Chinese, and many Indian. Males outnumber females by two to one. The principal products are tin, gambier, tapioca, rice, rubber, sugar, pepper, and other spices. The trade is largely a transit one. The Governor is also High Commissioner for the Federated Malay States, the salient particulars regarding which are given here:

State.	British Protectorate in	Area, sq. m.	Pop. (1911).
Perak	1874	7,900	494,123
Selangor	1874	3,200	294,014
Negri Sembilan	1885-89	2,600	130,201
Pahang	1888	14,000	117,595
		27,700	1,035,933

These states were federated in 1896. Their federal capital is Kuala Lumpur in Selangor. Their more notable products are tin, rubber, rice, coffee, sugar, tapioca, copra, pepper. Tin is mined in Perak by Chinese and worked at the mines, and at Singapore and Penang. See MALACCA.

Stralsund (Stral-soont′), a seaport of Prussia, on the narrow Strela Sound, which divides the mainland from the island of Rügen, 67 miles by rail NW. from Stettin. It forms an island, connected with the mainland by bridges, and down to 1873 it was a fortress of the first-class. Many of the houses are finely gabled; and the most interesting building is the town-house (1306). The manufactures include leather, sugar, starch, oil, and cards. Pop. 34,000. Founded in 1209, Stralsund became one of the most important members of the Hansa. It withstood a terrible siege (1628) by Wallenstein, but in 1678 capitulated to the Great Elector after a furious bombardment. It again opened its gates to Prussia in 1715, to the French in 1807, and to the Danes in 1809. The town was held by the Swedes from 1628 to 1814; in 1815 Denmark gave it up to Prussia.

Strangford, a Down seaport, on the W. shore of the entrance to Lough Strangford, opposite Portaferry, and 8 miles NE. of Downpatrick.—Lough Strangford measures 16 by 5 miles, and its entrance 6 miles by 1 mile.

Stranorlar, a Donegal village, on the Finn, 29 miles SW. of Londonderry.

Stranraer (Stran-rahr′), a royal burgh and seaport of Wigtownshire, beautifully situated at the head of Loch Ryan, 73 miles WSW. of Dumfries by rail. It has a 16th-century castle, with memories of Claverhouse, a town-hall and court-house (1872–73), and a 'short-sea passage' to Larne in Ireland. Pop. (1841) 4889; (1881) 6415; (1911) 6444. Till 1885 Stranraer returned one member with Wigtown (q.v.).

Strasburg (Ger. Strassburg, Fr. Strasbourg), the capital formerly of the French dep. of Bas-Rhin, but since 1871 of the German imperial territory of Alsace-Lorraine, stands on the river Ill and the canals connecting the Rhine with the Rhone and Marne, 2 miles from the Rhine, on which it has a port (1891). The citadel, originally built by Vauban (1682–84), was demolished by the Germans during the bombardment of 1870, but they have since rebuilt it and erected detached forts on the adjacent heights, so that Strasburg now ranks as a first-class fortress. Its position near the borders of France, Germany, and Switzerland gives it both commercial and strategic importance. The most celebrated building is the cathedral or minster, founded in 1015 or in 1179, but principally built between 1277 and 1439; some of the oldest parts are Romanesque, but the church as a whole is one of the sublimest specimens of Gothic architecture. Only one of the two towers was completed, with a spire of open stone-work (1439); it is 466 feet high. The minster has a remarkable clock (1838–42); in it are portions of an older one made in 1571, but there was a remarkable clock here in the 14th century. Here also are a magnificent rose-window (42 feet across), a fine pulpit, and grand stained glass. The damage done to the structure during the siege of 1870 was carefully repaired. Other notable buildings are the Protestant church of St Thomas, with the tomb of Marshal Saxe, the imperial palace, the library (formerly the castle, and then the episcopal palace), the new university, and the arsenal. Founded in 1621, the university became specially famous in the branches of medicine and philology, but was broken up during the Revolution. The university was completely reorganised as a German institution in 1872, is equipped with new university buildings (1884), magnificent laboratories, &c., and has more than 170 teachers and 2000 students. The famous library, with nearly 200,000 volumes and precious Incunabula, was entirely destroyed by fire during the bombardment in 1870, but was replaced by a new collection that has now swelled to 800,000 volumes. The trade, especially the transit trade, is very extensive; and the manufactures are very various—beer, pâtés de foie gras, leather, cutlery, engines, musical instruments, jewellery, tobacco, furniture, chemicals, &c. Pop. (1880) 104,471; (1890) 123,500; (1900) 151,041; (1910) 178,891.

Strasburg, the Argentoratum of the Romans, was colonised by them during the reign of Augustus; the name Stratisburgum first appears in the 6th c. It became a free town of the German empire in the 13th c.; in 1681 it was seized by Louis XIV. in a time of profound peace, and was confirmed to him by the treaty of Ryswick. On September 28, 1870, after a seven weeks' siege, it surrendered to the Germans.

Stratford, a thriving town of Essex, on the Lea, 4 miles ENE. of London. It had a Cistercian abbey (1134) and the Empress Matilda's three-arched, bow-shaped bridge (removed in 1839). Now part of the borough of West Ham, it has a handsome town-hall (1869), and is the seat of extensive manufactures. On the opposite side of the Lea is the parish of Bow, or Stratford-le-Bow, now in the met. borough of Poplar.

Stratford, a port of entry and capital of Perth county, Ontario, on the Avon, 88 miles by rail W. of Toronto, with railway-shops, woollen-mills, and manufactories of machinery, farming implements, boots and shoes, &c. Pop. 13,000.

Stratford-on-Avon, Shakespeare's birthplace, is a pleasant town of Warwickshire, 8 miles SW. of Warwick, 22 SSE. of Birmingham, and 110 NW. of London. It stands on the right bank of the quiet Avon, which here is spanned by the 'great and sumptuous bridge' of fourteen pointed arches, 376 yards long, that was built by the Lord Mayor of London, Sir Hugh Clopton, who died in 1496. 'Shakespeare's House,' where the poet was born on 23d April 1564, in Henley Street, is national property, having been bought for £3000 in 1847, and restored in 1858–59; here are a Shakespeare museum, the 'Stratford portrait,' and the signatures of Byron, Scott, Tennyson, Thackeray, Dickens, &c. King Edward VI.'s grammar-school, where Shakespeare was educated, was founded in the reign of Edward IV.; it occupies the upper story of the old guildhall, and was restored in 1892. The 'New Place,' built by Sir Hugh Clopton, was purchased by Shakespeare in 1597, and here he died on 23d April 1616; here, too, Queen Henrietta Maria stayed in 1643. It (or rather its successor, 1703) was wantonly razed in 1759 by the Rev. F. Gastrell, who also felled the poet's mulberry, beneath which Garrick was regaled in 1742; but its site has also become national property since 1861. And lastly, uprearing its spire above the lime-trees, there is the beautiful cruciform church, Early English to Perpendicular in style, having been gradually rebuilt between 1332 and 1500. In the chancel, whose two years' restoration was completed in 1892, is Shakespeare's grave, with the portrait bust (1616) by Gerard Janssen or Johnson, Anne Hathaway's grave, and the American stained-glass window of the 'Seven Ages.' The Shakespeare Fountain (1887) was also erected by an American, Mr George W. Childs; the red-brick Shakespeare Memorial Theatre, seating 800 spectators, was built in 1877–79 at a cost of £30,000. In the neighbourhood are Shottery, with Anne Hathaway's cottage (purchased for the nation in 1892 for £3000); Luddington, where tradition says she was married; Charlecote, the seat of the Lucys; Clopton, with memories of the Gunpowder Plot; and Welcombe Hill, crowned by an obelisk (1876), 124 feet high, to a Manchester M.P. In Stratford itself still remain to be noticed the chapel of the Guild of the Holy Cross (13th century; the chancel rebuilt about 1450, and the rest by Sir Hugh Clopton); the half-timbered house of the Harvards (1596); the town-hall (1633; rebuilt 1768–1863), with Gainsborough's portrait of Garrick; the corn exchange (1850); the market-house (1821); the College school (1872); a Roman Catholic church by Pugin (1866); and a hospital (1884). Before 691 a Saxon monastery stood at Stratford-on-Avon, which was incorporated in 1553. It is an important agricultural centre; still, its chief prosperity depends on the pilgrims (20,000 or so annually) who visit it. Pop. (1851) 3372; (1911) 8531, an increase largely due to the extension of the borough boundary in 1879. See works by Washington Irving (1821), Hawthorne (1863), Wheeler (1806), J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps (1863–85), Ribton Turner (1893), Sir Sidney Lee (1884; new ed. 1906), and H. C. Shelley (1913).

Strathaven (locally Straven), a town of Lanarkshire, 1 mile W. of Avon Water and 16 miles SSE. of Glasgow. On the north side is the picturesque ruin of Avondale Castle, and 5 to 7 miles south-west are the battlefields of Drumclog and Loudoun Hill. Pop. 3500.

Strathclyde'. In the 8th c. the ancient confederacy of the Britons was broken up into Wales and Cumbria. Scottish Cumbria, or Strathclyde, thenceforth formed a little kingdom, comprising the country between Clyde and Solway, governed by princes of its own, and having the fortress-town of Alclyde or Dumbarton for its capital. In 954–1124 it became permanently united to the Scottish kingdom.

Strathcona, a village of Alberta, Canada, named from the Canadian magnate Lord Strathcona, was amalgamated with Edmonton in 1912.

Strathearn. See Earn.

Strathfieldsaye, a Hampshire estate, with a Queen Anne mansion, overlooking the Loddon, 7 miles NNE. of Basingstoke. Associated ere that with the name of Pitt, it was purchased by parliament in 1817 for £263,000, and presented to the Duke of Wellington. See Silchester, and the Rev. Charles H. Griffith's History of Strathfieldsaye (1892).

Strathmore (Gael., 'Great Valley'), the most extensive plain in Scotland, is a low-lying tract extending NE. across the country from Dumbartonshire to Stonehaven in Kincardineshire, and bounded N. by the mountain-rampart of the Highlands, and S. by the Lennox, Ochil, and Sidlaw Hills. It is 100 miles long and 5 to 10 broad; but Strathmore proper extends only from Perth to near Brechin (about 40 miles).

Strathpeffer, a fashionable Scottish watering-place in Ross and Cromarty, to the south of Ben Wyvis (3429 feet), and 5 miles W. of Dingwall by rail, 215 NNW. of Edinburgh. Its sulphur and chalybeate springs are highly efficacious in digestive and rheumatic disorders. Pop. 400. See Dr Fortescue Fox's Strathpeffer Spa (1889).

Strathspey (Strath-spay'), the valley of the Spey (q.v.).

Stratton, a Cornish town, 16 miles NNW. of Launceston. Pop. with Bude, 3000.

Straubing (Strow'bing), an old town of Lower Bavaria, on the Danube's right bank, 25 miles by rail SE. of Ratisbon. Pop. 22,000.

Strawberry Hill. See Twickenham.

Streatham (Stret'am), a ward of Wandsworth, 6½ miles SSW. of St Paul's. Pop. 50,000.

Streator, a mining-town of Illinois, 94 miles SW. of Chicago. Pop. 15,000.

Street, a town of Somersetshire, 2 miles SW. of Glastonbury. Pop. 4200.

Stretford, a town of Lancashire, 3½ miles SW. of Manchester. Pop. 42,500.

Stretinsk, or Sryetinsk, a town of Siberia, on the navigable Shilka, a tributary of the Amur. Pop. 10,000.

Strigau (Stree-gow), a town of Prussian Silesia, 25 miles SE. of Liegnitz. Pop. 15,000.

Strokestown, a market-town, 12 miles NE. of Roscommon. Pop. 800.

Strom'boli, one of the Lipari Islands (q.v.), with a volcano almost constantly active.

Strome Ferry, Ross-shire, on salt-water Loch Carron, 53 miles by rail WSW. of Dingwall.

Strom'ness, a seaport in Pomona, Orkney, on a beautiful bay, 15 miles W. by S. of Kirkwall. Gow, Scott's 'Pirate,' was born here. Pop. 1600.

Strone, an Argyllshire watering-place, at the headland between Loch Long and Holy Loch, 6½ miles WNW. of Greenock.

Stronsay, one of the Orkney Islands, 12 miles NE. of Kirkwall. Area, 15 sq. m.; greatest height, 154 feet; pop. 1200.

Strontian (Stron-tee'an), an Argyllshire village, 24 miles SW. of Fort William, with former lead-mines, which yielded (1790) strontianite.

Stroud, a manufacturing and market town of Gloucestershire, 10 miles SSE. of Gloucester, on an eminence in a valley sheltered by the Coteswolds, where the Frome and Slade rivulets unite to form the Stroud Water or Frome. The water of this stream being peculiarly adapted for use in dyeing scarlet and other grain colours, cloth-factories and dyeworks have been built along its banks for 20 miles; and Stroud itself is the centre of the woollen manufactures of Gloucestershire, and contains a number of cloth-mills. The parish church, St Lawrence, was rebuilt, with exception of the tower and spire, in 1866–68; the town-hall, incorporating an Elizabethan façade, in 1865; and there are also the Subscription-rooms (1830), the Lansdown Hall (1879), a hospital (1876), &c. From 1832 to 1885 Stroud, with twelve other parishes, formed a parliamentary borough, returning two members. Pop. 8800.

Stry (Stree), or Stryi, a town of Austrian Galicia, on a tributary of the Dniester, 45 miles by rail S. of Lemberg. It was almost wholly burned down in April 1886. Pop. 30,000.

Studley Royal. See Ripon.

Stuhlweissenburg (Shtool-vice'en-boorg'; Hung. Székes Fehérvár; Lat. Alba Regia), a royal free town of Hungary, and seat of a bishop, 39 miles SW. of Budapest. Here the kings of Hungary were crowned and buried (1027–1527). Pop. 36,500.

Sturminster Newton, a Dorset town, on the Stour, 8½ miles NW. of Blandford. Pop. 1800.

Stuttgart (Shtoot'gart), the capital of Würtemberg, stands in a natural basin (817 feet above sea-level) surrounded by hills, which are studded with villas, vineyards, and gardens, and crowned with woods, 2 miles from the Neckar, and 189 by rail WNW. of Munich, 127 SSE. of Frankfort. Except the churches, most of the public edifices date from the 19th century, and are chiefly built in the Renaissance style. On or near the central Palace Square stand the new royal palace (1746–1807), the old royal castle (16th century), two or three other palaces of the royal family, the Königsbau (shops, bourse, concert-rooms, &c.), the theatre, the railway station (one of the finest in all Germany), the post-office, the Akademie (formerly the Carl School; now library and guardhouse), the jubilee column (1841), and statues of Schiller and Duke Eberhard. The Collegiate Church, St Leonard's, and the Hospital Church date from the 15th century. The other chief public institutions of Stuttgart are its famous Polytechnic (with 900 students), the Conservatory of Music, the royal library (550,000 vols.), the museum and picture-gallery, &c. Stuttgart is a great centre of the German book-trade, manufactures textiles, beer, pianofortes, chemicals, chocolate, &c., and has celebrated fairs. NE. of the palace lies the picturesque royal park (with some good statuary), extending almost all the way to Cannstatt (q.v.). There are many royal seats in the vicinity. Hegel and Hauff were natives. Pop. (including Cannstatt) 286,000. Stuttgart owes its name and origin to a stud-farm of the early Counts of Würtemberg, and has been the capital since 1482.

Styria (Ger. Steiermark), a duchy of Austria, is bounded on the N. by Upper and Lower Austria, E. by Hungary, S. and W. by Carniola, Carinthia, and Salzburg. Its area is 8629 sq. m., and pop. (1880) 1,213,197; (1910) 1,441,604, of whom 67 per cent. are of German and 33 per cent. of Slavonic origin. Styria is a mountainous country, traversed by ramifications of the Alps. The Save and Drave water the southern districts; the Mur, going S. to the Drave, flows through the middle of the duchy; while the Enns skirts the NW. boundary. Forests cover 51½ per cent. of the area; 25½ per cent. is pastures; and 22 per cent. is under cultivation. Styria's chief wealth lies in its mineral products, especially iron. It was made a separate margraviate in 1056, and in 1192 was joined to the Austrian crown.

Suakin (Soo-âh'keen), or more correctly SAWAKIN, a seaport of the Red Sea, stands on a small rocky island in a bay on its west side, and is the principal outlet for the commerce of Nubia and of the countries of the Sudan beyond. The island-town is connected with the settlement of El-Keff on the adjacent mainland by a causeway. Port Sudan, 30 miles to the north, has a better and safer harbour and much less trying climate; and since the opening, in 1906, of the railway thence to Atbara and Berber (connecting there with the Khartoum and Cairo—ultimately the 'Cape to Cairo'—line), threatens to supersede Suakin. The more important exports of Suakin are silver ornaments, ivory, gums, millet, cattle, hides, and gold; the imports, durra, cottons, flour, sugar, rice, ghi, dates, and coal. Near it several battles were fought by Egyptians and English against the Mahdi's followers. Pop. 10,000. See works by E. G. Parry (1885) and W. Galloway (1888).

Subiaco (Soobyâh'ko; anc. Sublaqueum), a city of Italy, lies embosomed in hills beside the Teverone, 32 miles E. by N. of Rome. It was the cradle of the Benedictine order and the place where the printing-press was first set up in Italy (1464). Two monasteries date from the 6th century; one of them (Santa Scolastica) contains a small but valuable library, whilst the other was built near St Benedict's cave. Pop. 8500.

Sud'bury, a municipal borough (till 1843 also parliamentary) of Suffolk, on the Stour at the Essex boundary, 16 miles S. of Bury St Edmunds and 58 NE. of London. It has three old churches, mainly Perpendicular in style, a town-hall (1828), grammar-school (1491; rebuilt 1857), corn exchange (1841), and manufactures of cocoa-nut matting, silk, bricks, &c.—the famous woollen industry of the Flemings, dating from the 14th century, having died out. Archbishop Theobald, beheaded by Tyler in 1381, and Gainsborough were natives. Pop. 7100.

Sudbury, a village of Ontario (pop. 4000), by rail 443 miles W. by N. of Montreal. Close by are immense deposits of copper and nickel.

Sudet'ic Mountains, a mountain-system of SE. Germany, dividing Prussian Silesia and Lusatia from Bohemia and Moravia, and connecting the Carpathians with the mountains of Franconia. It forms a continuous chain only in the middle—the Riesengebirge (q.v.) and Isergebirge.

Suez (Soo'ez), a town of Egypt, is situated at the southern extremity of the Suez Canal and on the Gulf of Suez, a northern arm of the Red Sea. Close beside the town the Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company have extensive store-houses, there is an English hospital, and the sweet-water canal terminates here. The railway from Ismailia runs through the town on to the spacious harbour 2 miles beyond. Suez has not a very large trade of its own (£800,000 to £900,000 annually); most of the commerce passes through it without making halt. Population, 18,400. More than once in the past this place, the Arsinoe of the Ptolemies, the Colzum of the early Moslems, was the seat of a flourishing trade; from the 16th to the 18th century it formed an important étape in the European trade with India. It revived when the overland mail route to India was opened in 1837, and has prospered more since the completion of the canal. Rameses II. seems to have been the first to excavate a canal between the Nile delta and the Red Sea, which was reopened by Darius I. of Persia, and again by the Moslem conquerors of Egypt. Napoleon commissioned Lepère in 1798 to examine and report upon the plan of a ship-canal between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. This expert's erroneous opinion, that the surface of the Red Sea was nearly 30 feet higher than that of the Mediterranean, put an end to the project. But the mistake having been corrected by English officers in 1841, Lesseps set himself (in 1849) to study the isthmus, and in 1854 he managed to enlist the interest of Said Pasha, khedive of Egypt, in his scheme. Two years later the Porte granted its permission and a company was formed. Half the capital was raised in Europe, chiefly in France; the other half by the khedive. In 1859, 25,000 to 30,000 men were at work excavating, and the canal was opened on the 16th November 1869. It had cost altogether about 24 million pounds. The total length is 100 miles; the width of the water-surface was at first 150 to 300 feet, the width at the bottom 72 feet, and the minimum depth 26 feet. At Port Said two strong breakwaters, 6940 and 6020 feet long respectively, were run out into the Mediterranean; at Suez another substantial mole was constructed. The canal crosses Lake Menzaleh (28 miles long), Lake Ballah, Lake Timsah (5 miles long), and the Bitter Lakes (23 miles). The highest point is but 50 feet above sea-level. At intervals of 5 or 6 miles side-basins are provided to enable vessels to pass one another. Erelong the traffic had increased so enormously that a second canal was talked about; and in 1886–90 the canal had been widened in some places to 213 feet. In 1914 deepening from 28 feet to 29 feet was authorised. In 1870, 486 vessels of 654,915 tons passed through the canal; in 1910, 4533 of 23,054,901 tons, of which 2778 vessels of 14,363,539 tons were British. The time required for passage has been shortened (by help of electric lights, &c.) from 36 hours to 24 hours. Lord Beaconsfield's government bought the khedive's shares (176,602 out of a total of 500,000) in 1875 for Britain. The total receipts exceed £5,000,000 annually. See works by Lesseps (1875 and 1881), his Life by G. B. Smith (1893), and the various periodic returns.

Suffolk (Suf'fok), the easternmost county of England, is bounded E. by the German Ocean, and elsewhere by Essex, Cambridgeshire, and Norfolk. Its length from E. to W. is 57 miles; its mean breadth from N. to S. about 30 miles; and its area, 1475 sq. m. Pop. (1801) 210,431; (1831) 296,317; (1861) 337,070; (1911) 394,060. Though no hills of any notable character rise within its confines, Suffolk is not by any means flat. The sea-coast is low and skirted by banks of shingle, except near Lowestoft and Southwold, and again at Dunwich and Felixstowe, which all rest on sandstone cliffs; beyond stretches an almost continuous series of light sandy heath-lands, glorious in summer with gorse and heather; and inland the country is undulating, well watered, and for the most part well wooded, the scenery in places—e.g. at Yoxford ('the Garden of Suffolk'), and in the vale of the Gipping—being very picturesque. More than two-thirds of the county consists of heavy land, a stiff clay prevailing in Mid (or as it is locally termed 'High') Suffolk, whilst the western part lies upon chalk, terminating at its north-west corner with a tract of peaty fen-land. The Waveney, Alde, Deben, Orwell, and Stour, all flowing eastwards, are the principal rivers. Coprolites are raised in the region between Ipswich and Woodbridge, gunflints at Brandon. Agriculture, despite the depression of late years, still forms the staple industry, 780,000 acres being under cultivation. The manufactures are noticed under Ipswich (the capital), Beccles, Stowmarket, and Sudbury, these being, with Bury St Edmunds, Lowestoft, Woodbridge, Felixstowe, and Haverhill, the chief towns. The county of Suffolk was made a bishopric in 1913. Its parliamentary divisions are five in number, each returning one member, and it has two county councils, one for the eastern and the other for the western district. In antiquities the county is especially rich, and amongst them may be noted the ruins of the castles of Burgh (Roman), Framlingham, Orford, and Wingfield; the gatehouse of Butley Priory (Norman); earthworks at Fornham, Haughley, Nacton, and Snape; the fine flint-work churches; and the old halls (many of them moated) of Helmingham, Parham, Hengrave, Rushbrooke, Ickworth, Somerleyton, Giffords, and West Stow. Suffolk worthies (other than those named under Ipswich and Bury St Edmunds) have been Bishops Grosseteste, Aungerville, and Bale; Archbishop Sancroft; Chief-justices Glanvill and Cavendish; George Cavendish (Wolsey's biographer); Nash, Crabbe, and Robert Bloomfield (poets); Sir Simonds D'Ewes; the Earl of Arlington, Roger North; Gainsborough, Frost, Constable, and Bright (artists); Bunbury (caricaturist), Woolner (the sculptor), Lord Chancellor Thurlow, Arthur Young, Clara Reeve, Mrs Inchbald, Kirby (naturalist), John Hookham Frere, Crabb Robinson, Sir Philip Broke, John and Charles Austin, Admirals Fitzroy and Rous, Dr Routh, Professors Maurice and Cowell, Edward FitzGerald, Sir Henry Thompson, Agnes Strickland, and Miss Betham Edwards. See works by Kirby (2d ed. 1764), Cullum (1813), Gage (1838), Page (1844), Suckling (2 vols. 1846–48), Glyde (1858–66), Baynes (2 vols. 1873), Taylor (new ed. 1892), and White (1891); and the 'Victoria History' (1907 et seq.).

Suhl (Sool), a town of Prussia, in a romantic Thuringian valley, 32 miles by rail SW. of Erfurt; celebrated for its firearms, as formerly for its swords and armour. Pop. 15,000.

Suilven. See Sutherland.

Suir (Shure), a river of Ireland, flowing 85 miles SW. and E., chiefly along the boundaries of Tipperary, Waterford, Kilkenny, and Wexford, past Clonmel, Carrick, and Waterford, till it meets the Barrow, and falls into Waterford Haven.

Sukhum Kale (Sook'hoom Kah-leh; anc. Dioscurias), a fortified seaport (Russian since 1877) of the Caucasus, on the E. coast of the Black Sea, 70 miles N. by W. of Poti.

Sukkur, a town on the Indus' right bank, 28 miles by rail SE. of Shikarpur; it is connected by rail also with Karachi, and is the terminus of the Bolan Pass Railway to Afghanistan. The river is crossed by a magnificent cantilever bridge (1889), or rather two bridges (one 820 feet in span), resting on Bukkur Island. New Sukkur grew up after the British occupied (1839) the fort on Bukkur. Pop. (1872) 13,318; (1901) 31,316. Near Old Sukkur, a mile away, are old tombs.

Sulgrave, a Northants parish, the Washingtons' ancestral seat, 6 miles NNW. of Brackley.

Suliman Hills (Soo-lee-mâhn'), a rocky, barren mountain-range running over 350 miles N. and S., between Afghanistan and the Punjab. The highest summit, Takht-i-Sulaiman (Solomon's Throne), 11,295 feet high, was first ascended by a European, Major Holdich, in 1883.

Sulina (Soolee'na), a lower branch of the Danube (q.v.). The Roumanian town of Sulina (pop. 6000) is on its S. bank, near the mouth.

Sulmo'na, or Solmona, a city of Italy, 80 miles by rail E. of Rome. It stands 1575 feet above sea-level, and has a cathedral (1119). Here were born Ovid and Pope Innocent VII. On a mountain close by stood until 1870 the 'mother monastery' of the Celestines. Pop. 20,000.

Sultanabad, a Persian town in the west of Irak-Ajemi, and capital of the province, with a famous carpet manufacture. Pop. 20,000.

Sulu Islands, an archipelago of 188 mountainous islands stretching from Borneo NE. to the Philippines, with a total area of 948 sq. m. and a pop. of 60,000. The Malay-Mohammedan inhabitants were, as bold pirates, the terror of the seas, until the Spaniards conquered them in 1876; in 1899 the sultan recognised the authority of the United States.

Sumatra (Soo'matra, usu. Syoo-may'tra; named from the ancient town of Samudera in the north) is after Borneo the largest island of the East Indian Archipelago or Indonesia, having an area not much less than that of Spain, calculated at 165,600 sq. m. Towards the middle it is crossed lengthwise by the equator; the greatest length is 1115 miles, the greatest breadth 275. An imposing mountain-system, consisting of several nearly parallel ranges (7000 to 10,000 feet high), with intervening plateaus and valleys—forms the framework of the island, which has a bold and frequently precipitous coast towards the west. Seven or eight volcanoes are still active, including Indrapura (the culminating peak of the island, 11,800 feet), Merapi (the most restless), Pasaman or Mount Ophir (which broke out in 1891), &c. Towards the west the rivers are of necessity short and rapid, but several of the eastward streams grow to imposing rivers in their passage through the plains. They are fed by an abundant rainfall (83 inches at Deli). The flora is exceptionally rich. Vast but too rapidly diminishing areas of the mountain regions are covered with virgin forest, a striking contrast to the wide alluvial prairies. The Dutch expedition of 1877–79 collected 400 varieties of timber. Rice, sugar, coffee, pepper, cocoa-nuts, sago, maize, sweet potatoes, yams, tobacco, and of late rubber, are cultivated. Gold, tin, and coal are worked, the last especially at Ombilin, united with the west coast by railway in 1891. The petroleum found at Langkat and elsewhere is another source of wealth. Of mammals, more are common to Borneo than to Java. The birds and snakes are in the main Bornean. The Bornean forms, however, are almost entirely confined to the eastern side of the island. The orang-utan and the bru, the true tiger, the Malay bear, the rusa deer, the Malay hog, the tapir, the two-horned Sumatran rhinoceros, and the Sumatran elephant are characteristic forms.

Among the birds are Argus pheasants, hornbills, goat-suckers, and grakles. Both the python (15 to 20 feet long) and the cobra are of frequent occurrence, and the crocodile swarms in many of the rivers. Sumatra is peopled in the main by tribes of the Malay stock, differing very markedly in degree of civilisation, custom, and language. An earlier non-Malay element is represented—the Kubus, a savage forest-dwelling race; the Battas; and the Redjangers. Hindu influences, which have left their mark in ruined temples, religious customs, language, alphabets, &c., began to tell on Sumatra prior to the 7th c. In the 13th Mohammedanism was introduced. The island became known in 1508 through Lopez de Figuera. The Portuguese were ousted by the Dutch towards the close of the 16th c.; though the permanent Dutch occupation was not completely carried out round the coast till 1881, and much of the interior is still semi-independent and unexplored. The Dutch possessions were in the hands of the British between 1811 and 1816, and portions down till 1825. Atjeh, Achin or Atcheen (q.v.), only subdued after a long war (1875–79) and not pacified until 1908, was formed into a government in 1881. The total pop. of Sumatra and the adjacent islands is estimated at 4,000,000 (Achin, 582,000; West Coast, 1,722,000; East Coast, 568,000; Bencoelen, 204,000, &c.). Chief centres of population are Padang, Achin, Bencoelen, and Palembang. See Marsden's History (1783); the memoir of Sir Stamford Raffles; Wallace's Malay Archipelago and Australasia; Forbes, A Naturalist's Wanderings (1885); and books by Otto (1893), Maas (1895), Cabaton (1911).

Sumba'wa, one of the chain of the Sunda Islands, to the east of Java, lies between Lombok (on the west) and Flores (on the east), and yields rice, tobacco, cotton, sandalwood, &c. Area, 5200 sq. m.; pop. 150,000, all Malays and Mohammedans. The four native rulers owe allegiance to the Dutch governor of Celebes. In 1815 an eruption of Tambora, the loftiest peak, whereby its altitude was decreased from 14,000 to 7670 feet, cost 12,000 lives. Another eruption took place in 1836, and one of another peak, Gunong Api, in 1860.

Summer Isles, a group of twenty rocky islets off the west coast of Scotland, near the entrance of Loch Broom, an inlet (7 miles long and 12½ miles wide at the entrance) of NW. Ross-shire. The largest, Tanera, measures 1¾ by 1½ mile.

Sumy, a town of Russia, 125 miles by rail NW. of Kharkoff. Pop. 30,000.

Sunart (Soo'nart), LOCH, a picturesque sea-inlet of W. Argyllshire, winding 19½ miles E.

Sunbury, a Middlesex village, on the Thames, 4¾ miles W. of Kingston. Pop. 4600.

Sunbury, capital of Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, on the Susquehanna, 53 miles by rail N. of Harrisburg. Pop. 12,000.

Sunda Islands (Soon'da), a name applied sometimes to the long chain of islands stretching SE. from the Malay Peninsula to the north coast of Australia. More properly it means the islands that lie between the E. end of Java and the N. side of Timor—Bali, Lombok, Sumbawa, Flores, Sandalwood Island, &c. (see separate articles). Sunda Strait is a passage, 70 to 90 miles broad, lying between Sumatra and Java and connecting the Indian Ocean with the Sunda Sea. Several islands stud its waters, as Krakatoa (q.v.), Princes Island, Steers, and Calmeijer.

Sundarbans (Soon'derbuns), or SUNDERBUNDS, the lower portion of the delta of the Ganges, extending 165 miles eastward from the mouth of the Húglí to that of the Meghna, and stretching inland for 83 miles. The total area is estimated at 7550 sq. m. The region is entirely alluvial, with vast swamps and a network of streams. Next the sea is a wide belt of dense jungle, the haunt of wild beasts. Behind this belt the land is cultivated, the fields being enclosed with embankments. Rice is the staple crop.

Sunderland, a seaport, municipal, county, and parliamentary borough of Durham, at the mouth of the Wear, 13 miles NE. of the city of Durham and 12 SE. of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The township of Sunderland, on the south side of the river, covers only 219½ acres; the municipal borough comprises also the townships of Bishopwearmouth, Monkwearmouth, and Monkwearmouth Shore. Monkwearmouth appears in history in 674 as the site of a monastery erected by Benedict Biscop; Bishopwearmouth in 930 was conferred by Athelstan on the monks of Lindisfarne then settled at Chester-le-Street. The earliest indubitable reference to Sunderland itself does not occur till 1311. Sunderland is a fine, well-built town, with broad, clean streets and pleasant suburbs. Till the beginning of the 19th c. it was a very inconsiderable place, but owing to the improvement of the harbour and the growth of the Durham coal trade, it has developed with great rapidity. The principal public buildings and institutions are the Italian Renaissance town-hall (1887–90); the Free Library, Museum, Art Gallery, and Winter Garden (1877–79); Sunderland Literary Society and Subscription Library (1878); the Theatre Royal (1853); the Avenue Theatre; the Victoria Hall (1872), the scene of the terrible disaster of June 16, 1883, in which 182 children lost their lives; the Assembly Hall; the Workmen's Hall (1868); the Liberal Club (1839); the County Constitutional Club (1890); the Infirmary (1865; enlarged 1879–87); the Orphan Asylum (1860). St Peter's, Monkwearmouth, retains in a part of the tower and west wall of the nave a remnant of the 7th-century building. The People's or Mowbray Park is an excellent recreation-ground. The portion south of the railway was purchased in 1854, and contains monuments of Havelock and Jack Crawford. The New or Extension Park, north of the railway, was purchased in 1866. Roker, a watering-place close to Monkwearmouth, has also a park of 17 acres, opened in 1880. Two single-arch iron bridges cross the Wear at a distance of 20 yards from each other. The older bridge (1793–96), 236 feet in span, was reconstructed and widened in 1858–59. The railway bridge was opened in 1879. The harbour is formed by two piers, the north one 617 yards long, the south 650. A new pier, starting from the south end of the terrace promenade at Roker, is over 2000 feet long. Two other piers protect the entrance to the south docks. There are four docks capable of accommodating the largest vessels—the North Dock (6 acres), the Hudson Dock, North (18 acres), the Hudson Dock, South (14 acres), the Hendon Dock (11 acres). The annual shipments of coal and coke exceed 4,000,000 tons. From the commissioners' staiths 15,000 tons can be shipped in a day. Other exports are bottles and glass, earthenware, lime, iron, chemicals, patent fuel, and cement. The principal imports are timber, props, iron ores, chalk, loam, grain, flour, esparto grass, hay, straw, and tar. Sunderland is famous for its iron shipbuilding yards, of which there are thirteen. There are also extensive ironworks, forges, anchor and chain works, glass and bottle works, chemical works, roperies, paper-mills, breweries, and lime-kilns. In Monkwearmouth is the Pemberton coal-pit, 381 fathoms deep, and extending under the sea. Sunderland returns two members. Pop. of parl. borough (1851) 67,394; (1881) 124,760; (1911) 165,295, of whom 151,159 were in the municipal and county borough. Havelock was born at Ford Hall, Bishopwearmouth (1795); Jack Crawford, the hero of Camperdown (1775–1831), at Sunderland; other natives were Clarkson Stanfield, R.A., Tom Taylor, and Swan the electrician.

Sundsvall (Soonds-val), a Swedish seaport, on the Gulf of Bothnia, 80 miles N. by W. of Stockholm, and 290 by rail E. by S. of Trondhjem, has ironworks and sawmills. Pop. 17,000.

Suona'da, or the Inland Sea of Japan, separates the islands of Kyushu and Shikoku from the main island, Honshu. It is 250 miles in length from the strait of Shimonoseki (q.v.) to Osaka, has a maximum breadth of 50 miles, and is studded with innumerable islets and rocks.

Superior, capital of Douglas county, Wisconsin, at the W. end of Lake Superior, opposite Duluth. It ships much iron and copper ore, is an important grain market, and has shipbuilding, flour-milling, and miscellaneous manufactures. Pop. 40,400.

Superior, LAKE, the largest body of fresh water on the globe, is the highest and most western of the great lakes lying between Canada and the United States. It is bounded N. and E. by Ontario, S. by Michigan and Wisconsin, and NW. by Minnesota. Greatest length, 412 miles; greatest breadth, 167 miles; area, 31,200 sq. m.—nearly that of Ireland. The surface of the lake is $601\frac{8}{10}$ feet above sea-level, and its mean depth 475 feet; its maximum depth is 1008 feet. Its surface has an elevation of 20½ feet above that of Lakes Huron and Michigan; this difference occurs in the rapids of St Mary's River, the only outlet (see SAULT STE MARIE). Lake Superior, being situated very near the watershed between Hudson Bay and the Mississippi, receives no rivers of importance, although hundreds of small rivers pour themselves into it, the largest the St Louis and the Nipigon. The bold and rocky northern coast is fringed with numerous islands of basalt and granite, some rising sharply from deep water to 1300 feet above the lake. The largest, Isle Royale, is 44 miles long. The southern shore is generally lower. Keweenaw Point (q.v.) projects far into the lake. At Grand Isle Bay, 100 miles W. of Sault Ste Marie, are the Pictured Rocks, cliffs of sandstone, 50 to 200 feet high, in many places presenting fantastic forms, and marked by vertical bands and blotches of red and yellow. The water is singularly pure and transparent. The lake never freezes over, but the shore ice prevents navigation in winter. It is subject also to very violent storms, with waves 15 to 18 feet high. It has the small tides common to the great lakes, and also the seiches seen in Swiss lakes—a regular series of small waves, or pulsations, at ten minutes' intervals. Towns on the Canadian side are Sault Ste Marie and Port Arthur, and on the American side Duluth, Superior, and Marquette. The Canadian Pacific Railway passes along the northern shore.

Surabaya (Soorabī'ya), a seaport and capital of a province on the N. coast of Java, opposite Madura Island. Here the Dutch have an arsenal, a mint, sugar and furniture factories, shipbuilding yards, and foundries. Sugar, coffee, hides, tobacco, rice, and cotton are exports; pop. 150,000.

Surakarta, a town in the centre of Java, connected by rail with Samarang on the N. and Surabaya on the E.; pop. 120,000.

Surat', a city of India, on the S. bank of the Tapti (crossed by a five-girder bridge), 14 miles from its mouth, and 160 by rail N. of Bombay. It stretches in a semicircle for more than a mile along the river, the quondam citadel (1540; government offices since 1862) forming the central feature. The chief buildings are four handsome mosques, two Parsee fire-temples, three Hindu temples, the old English and Dutch factories, and a clock-tower (80 feet high). The existing city in 1512, soon after its foundation, was burned by the Portuguese, as again in 1530 and 1531. In 1612 the English established themselves there, and shortly after they were followed by the Dutch. Surat then traded with Europe, Arabia, Persia, Ceylon, the East Indies, &c., and silk, cotton, and indigo were the most valuable exports. Here the Mohammedan pilgrims of India were wont to embark for Mecca. Shortly after 1650 the Mahrattas began to harass the city, and towards the end of the 17th century the commerce of Surat began to decline, Bombay gradually taking its place. The place came under British rule entirely in 1800, and for a time it had a revival of its old prosperity. But in 1837 it was almost wholly ruined by a disastrous fire followed by a great flood. It flourished once more during the American civil war, its chief export being cotton. Pop. (1811) 250,000; (1847) 80,000; (1881) 109,840; (1911) 114,863.

Surrey, an inland county in the south of England, separated on the N. by the Thames from Middlesex, and bounded elsewhere by Kent, Sussex, Hants, and Berks. Its maximum length from E. to W. is 39 miles; its greatest breadth, 26 miles; and its area, 721 sq. m. or 461,829 acres. Pop. (1801) 269,043; (1831) 485,700; (1861) 831,093; (1911) 845,578. Far-famed for the beauty of its scenery, Surrey is traversed from east to west by the North Downs (see DOWNS), which, near Titsey on the Kentish border, rise to 880 feet. On the north side of this range the land slopes gradually to the Thames—though even there plenty of high ground is to be found, as Cooper's Hill, St George's Hill, Richmond Park, and Wimbledon Common—but on the south the descent is rugged and broken up before the level of the Weald is reached. South of the main range, and about 5 miles distant from Dorking, is Leith Hill (967 feet), the highest point in the county, whilst in the extreme southwest rises Hind Head (903 feet). From all these places, as also from many others, glorious views are to be obtained, a noticeable feature in the landscapes being the prevalence of commons and heath-lands—the latter chiefly in the west. Of rivers the most important are the Wey and the Mole, both tributaries of the Thames. Surrey is well wooded, box-trees especially growing in great profusion, and around Farnham some 2000 acres are under hops. Croydon, Guildford, Kingston, and Reigate are—not reckoning the suburbs of London—the principal manufacturing centres and most important towns; near the last named also extensive beds of fuller's earth are found. The county is divided into fourteen hundreds, and since 1885 has returned six members to parliament. Between Kingston and Ockley traces of the old Roman road from London to Chichester are plainly visible, whilst on Wimbledon Common, Hascombe Hill, and near Aldershot are Roman encampments. The castles of Farnham and Guildford and the ruined abbeys of Newark and Waverley call for attention; at Claremont, Oatlands Park, and Sheen (now Richmond), were royal residences; and quaintly-timbered old houses—many of them moated—abound in the districts around Gomshall, Godalming, and Haslemere. Of Surrey worthies the best known are William of Ockham, Thomas Cromwell, Archbishops Abbot and Whately, Bishops Corbet and Wilberforce, Middleton and Oxenford (the dramatists), John Evelyn, Sir W. Temple, Bolingbroke, Rodney, Banks (the sculptor), Gibbon, Horne Tooke, Cobbett, Malthus, Herring (the animal painter), Faraday, Rennie, Sydney Herbert, Robert Browning, Hablot K. Browne, Albert Smith, Dr Jowett, Eliza Cook, Sant (the R.A.), Sir George Grove, Professor Cayley, Sir Sidney Colvin, Dr Furnivall, Gilchrist (the biographer), and Miss Faithfull. See works by Manning (3 vols. 1804–14), Allen (2 vols. 1829–30), Brayley (5 vols. 1841–48), Bevan (Stanford's series, new ed. 1891); Murray's Handbook (new ed. 1888); On Surrey Hills (1892); and the 'Victoria History' (1902–12).

Sus, (1) a river and district of Morocco between the Atlas and the Anti-Atlas.—(2) A port of Tunis, 75 miles SE. of the capital. Pop. 8000.

Susa (the Shushan of Daniel, Esther, &c.), a town of Persia, the ancient capital of Susiana (the Elam of Scripture, mod. Khusistan), and one of the most important cities of the old world. Its ruins cover 3 sq. m., and include four spacious platforms above 100 feet high. See books by Williams, Loftus, Churchill, and Dieulafoy.

Susa, a city of Northern Italy, on a tributary of the Po, at the foot of the Cottian Alps, 32 miles by rail W. of Turin. It has a cathedral (1029), and a triumphal arch (8 B.C.). Pop. 5000.

Susquehanna, an American river, the North Branch (350 miles) of which has its origin in Schuyler Lake, in Central New York, and the West Branch (250 miles) in the Alleghany Mountains. These two unite at Northumberland, Pennsylvania, and the river thence flows 150 miles S. and SE. to the N. end of Chesapeake Bay. It is a shallow, rapid, mountain river, with varied and romantic scenery, and is of use mainly for floating timber. On its banks Coleridge and Southey proposed to found their 'pantisocracy.'

Sussex, a maritime county in the south of England, washed on the SE. and S. for 91 miles by the English Channel, and elsewhere bounded by Hampshire, Surrey, and Kent. It has an extreme length from E. to W. of 76 miles, an extreme width of 27, and an area of 1455 sq. m., or 931,409 acres. From the Hampshire border, near Petersfield, to Beachy Head (q.v., 575 feet) the county is traversed by the chalky South Downs, whose highest point is Duncton Down (over 800 ft.), and whose northern escarpment is steep, but leads down to the fertile and richly wooded Weald. Beyond this again, in the north-east, is the Forest Ridge (804 feet). A very productive tract, 2 to 7 miles broad, extends westward from Brighton along the coast to the Hampshire boundary; in the south-east are rich marshlands, affording excellent pasture. The chief streams, all unimportant, are the Arun, Adur, Ouse, and Rother. Rather more than two-thirds is in cultivation; and the area under woods—in the Weald, St Leonards and Ashdown Forests, &c.—is greater than in almost any other English county. The Downs (q.v.) are clothed with a short, fine, and delicate turf; and here and elsewhere graze the well-known Southdown sheep. Sussex was once the chief seat of the iron trade, when wood was used for smelting, and its last furnace was not blown out till 1809; to-day the manufactures are unimportant. The county, which contains 6 'rapes,' 68 hundreds, and 2 administrative counties, East Sussex and West Sussex, returns six members to parliament. Brighton and Hastings are parliamentary, and Arundel, Chichester, Eastbourne, Lewes, Rye, Worthing, Hove, and Bexhill, municipal boroughs; whilst Newhaven, Seaford, Shoreham, Littlehampton, Bognor, Horsham, East Grinstead, Burgess Hill, and Hayward's Heath also deserve mention. Pop. (1841) 300,075; (1911) 663,378. Sussex contains the landing-place of Cæsar (55 B.C.); of Ælla (477 A.D.), from whose subjects, the South Saxons, the county derived its name; and of William the Conqueror (1066) at Pevensey, as well as the battlefields of Hastings and Lewes. The antiquities include a British camp at Cissbury, Roman remains at Pevensey and Bognor, Chichester cathedral (12th century), a dozen mediæval castles (Arundel, Bodiam, Hurstmonceaux, Hastings, Bramber, &c.), and nine or ten religious houses (Lewes, Battle, &c.). Cobden, Collins, Fletcher, Otway, Sackville, Selden, and Shelley have been among the eminent natives; and Sussex also has memories of Chillingworth, Lyell, Archdeacon Hare, John Sterling, Richard Jefferies, Cardinal Manning, Titus Oates, Hayley, Blake, Francis Thompson, and Tennyson.

See works by T. W. Horsfield (1835), Lower (3 vols. 1865–70), Parish (1886), G. F. Chambers (3d ed. 1891), A. Hare (1894), and E. V. Lucas (1904); and the 'Victoria History' (1900 et seq.).

Sutherland, a maritime county in the extreme north of Scotland, is bounded W. and N. by the Atlantic, E. by Caithness, SE. by the North Sea, and S. by the Dornoch Firth and by Ross and Cromarty. Measuring 63 by 49 miles, it has an area of 2028 sq. m., or 1,297,914 acres. The Atlantic coasts, deeply indented by sea-lochs, are bold and rock-bound, in Cape Wrath (q.v.) attaining 523 feet; the south-eastern seaboard is comparatively flat. On the Caithness boundary rise the Hill of Ord (1324 feet) and Cnoc an Eireannaich (1698); but the mountains of Sutherland are all in the west—Benmore Assynt (3273), Coniveall (3234), Ben Clibrick (3154), Ben Hope (3040), Foinaven (2980), Canisp (2779), and Suilven or the Sugar-loaf (2399). The Oykell, tracing the Ross-shire boundary, and falling into the Dornoch Firth, is the longest stream (35 miles); and of over 300 lochs and tarns the largest are Lochs Shin (16 × 1½ miles) and Assynt (q.v., 6¾ × ¾). Coal has been mined at Brora off and on since 1573; and gold at Kildonan (q.v.). The total percentage of cultivated area is only 2·9, in spite of costly reclamations carried on by the third Duke of Sutherland (1828–92), by far the largest proprietor—so costly indeed that during 1853–82 the expenditure on his estates exceeded the income derived from them by nearly a quarter of a million sterling. The live-stock includes over 10,000 cattle and 200,000 sheep; and the deer-forests, grouse-moors, and fishings (especially good for trout) attract many sportsmen. The climate varies much, like the rainfall, which increases westward from 32 to 60 inches. Sutherland returns one member; its county town is Dornoch (q.v.). Pop. (1801) 23,117; (1851) 25,793; (1881) 23,370; (1911) 21,180. The Northmen, who down to the 12th c. often descended on Sutherland and pillaged it, called it the 'Southern land,' as lying to the south of the Orkney and Shetland Islands. The 'Sutherland Clearances,' by which many small tenants were removed, took place in 1810–20. See works by Sir Robert Gordon (1813), Bishop Pococke (1888), St John (2 vols. 1849; new ed. 1884), A. Young (1880), A. Mackenzie (1883), and Edwards-Moss (1888).

Sutlej, or Satlaj (anc. Hyphasis or Hesidrus), the eastmost of the five rivers of the Punjab, rises in the sacred lakes of Manasarowar and Rakas-tal in Tibet, at a height of 15,200 feet, and near the sources of the Indus and Brahmaputra. It flows at first NW., but turns westward to cut its way through the Himalayas, during which passage it drops to 3000 feet. After entering British territory it pursues a SW. direction, and after flowing 900 miles in all joins the Indus at Mithankot, S. of Multan. It is crossed near Jullunder by a magnificent iron railway bridge, 2½ miles long, and by another near Bhawalpur, just before the influx of the Jhelum-Chenab.

Sutton, a town and urban district in Surrey, 11 miles from London. Pop. 21,300.

Sutton Bridge, a town of Lincolnshire, on the Nen, 7 miles N. of Wisbech. Pop. 2200.

Sutton Coldfield, a municipal borough of Warwickshire, 8 miles NE. of Birmingham, with an Early English church, extended in Henry VIII.'s reign and 1879. Henry VIII. gave a charter in 1529, and a new one was granted in 1885. Agriculture is the chief occupation of the neighbourhood; but the town itself is becoming a residential suburb of Birmingham. The picturesque Sutton Park (3500 acres) is a favourite picnic resort. Pop. 20,100.

Sutton-in-Ashfield, a town of Nottinghamshire, 3 miles SW. of Mansfield. It has a fine church (1390; restored 1868), hosiery manufactures, and neighbouring coal-pits and lime-works. Pop. 21,700.

Sutton-on-Sea, a Lincolnshire seaside-resort, 28 miles NE. of Boston by rail.

Suvalky, or Ssuwalki, a Polish town, 48 miles NW. of Grodno. Pop. 22,000.—Area of Suvalky government, 4800 sq. m.; pop. 670,000.

Suwanee River (Soo-waw'nee), rises in southern Georgia, in the Okefinokee Swamp, and winds SSW. through Florida to the Gulf of Mexico.

Suzdal (Sooz'dal), a Russian town, 12 miles N. of Vladimir. Pop. 7000.

Svenigorodka, a town in the Russian province of Kieff, 100 miles S. of Kieff. Pop. 17,000.

Swabia (Ger. Schwaben), an ancient duchy of SW. Germany, stretching from Franconia to Helvetia (Switzerland) and from Burgundy and Lorraine to Bavaria, and mostly embraced since 1806 in Würtemberg (q.v.). It was named from the Germanic Suevi, who drove out its Celtic inhabitants in the 1st century B.C.

Swadlincote, a town of Derbyshire, 4 miles SE. of Burton-upon-Trent. Pop. of urb. dist. 18,700.

Swaffham, a town of Norfolk, 15 miles SE. of Lynn. It has a cruciform church (1474) of great beauty, a corn-hall (1858), and an ugly market-cross (1783). Pop. 3200.

Swahili Coast, the home of the Swahili race, on the east coast of Africa, opposite Zanzibar and extending northward to Vitu.

Swale, a river in the North Riding of Yorkshire, flowing 60 miles ESE., and near Aldborough uniting with the Ure to form the Ouse (q.v.). See also Sheppey.

Swallow Falls, a waterfall on the Llugwy, Carnarvonshire, 2½ miles NW. of Bettws-y-Coed.

Swanage, a pleasant little watering-place of Dorsetshire, in the 'Isle' of Purbeck, nestling in the southern curve of a lovely bay, 9½ miles SE. of Wareham, but 11 by a branch-line opened in 1885. In Swanage Bay, in 877, King Alfred won England's first naval victory—a defeat of the Danes. Population, 4700. See Purbeck, and J. Braye's Swanage (1890).

Swansea (Welsh Abertawe), a seaport of Glamorganshire, on the banks and at the mouth of the river Tawe, 45 miles WNW. of Cardiff and 216 W. of London, is a municipal, parliamentary, and also (since 1888) county borough. Besides the Royal Institution of South Wales, it has other art galleries and museums, a technical college, and a training college. Its rapid progress depends on the manufacture of tin-plate here and in the neighbourhood; on its harbour and docks (extended 1904–9); and on its position on a bay affording a spacious, sheltered, and safe anchorage. The Harbour Trust of Swansea possesses docks, constructed since 1847, covering an area of 130 acres. There is annually manufactured in Swansea and the immediate neighbourhood upwards of two-thirds of the tin-plate manufactured in Britain, representing a value of over £5,000,000. The imports include copper, silver, lead, tin, nickel, iron and steel. The chief exports are tin, terne and black plates, coal and coke, copper, zinc, iron and steel, alkali, superphosphate, arsenic, &c. Pop. of municipal borough (1851) 31,461; (1881) 65,597; (1911) 114,663. Since 1885 Swansea, which has now a bishop-suffragan under St Davids, returns two members, one for the town and one for the district division (Aberavon, Kenfig, Loughor, and Neath). The charter dates from the days of King John and Henry III. The castle, of which a tower still remains, was founded in 1099 by the Earl of Warwick; in Edward IV.'s reign it passed by marriage from the Herberts to the Somerset family, and is still the property of the Dukes of Beaufort. The grammar-school dates from 1682.

Swatow, a Chinese seaport, opened to foreign trade since 1869, at the mouth of the Han, 225 miles E. of Canton. It is the seat of great sugar-refineries, and of bean-cake and grass-cloth manufactures. Pop. 40,000.

Swaziland (Swâh'zee), a South African native state, lying W. of the Libomba Mountains, and intruding into the E. side of the Transvaal. Area, 6536 sq. m.; pop. 100,000 Swazis and 1000 white men. Its trade, valued at £70,000, goes either through Natal or by way of Delagoa Bay. Its independence was recognised by the Transvaal and Britain in 1884; since 1904 it has been under the control of the British government. The Swazis, a Zulu-Kaffir race, smelt copper and iron, and are noted for their wood-carving.

Sweden (Swedish Sverige), a kingdom of northern Europe, occupying the eastern side of the Scandinavian peninsula, with which, from 1814 till the amicable but definitive separation in 1905, Norway (q.v.) was associated under one crown. Its greatest length, N. to S., is close on 1000 miles; its greatest breadth 300; its area 170,970 sq. m.; and its coast-line 1550 miles. Besides many skerry-islands, Sweden owns Gothland (q.v.) and Œland (q.v.). The country may be generally described as a broad plain sloping south-eastwards from the Kjölen Mountains to the Baltic. The only mountainous districts adjoin Norway; the peaks sink in altitude from 7000 feet in the north to 3800 in 61° 30′ N. lat. Immediately south of this point a subsidiary chain strikes off to the SE., and, threading the lake-region of central Sweden, swells out beyond into a tableland with a mean elevation of 850 feet and maximum of 1240 feet. Fully two-thirds of the entire surface lies lower than 800 feet, and one-third lower than 300 feet, above sea-level. Most of Sweden is built up of crystalline gneisses and granite, and of Lower Silurian limestones, sandstones, and slates; and there are extensive glacial deposits. The eastern or Bothnian coast, like the western coast of Norway, is gradually rising; whilst the coast of Scania, in the extreme south, tends to subside. The climate of Sweden is continental in the north, along the Norwegian frontier, and on the southern plateau. The lakes in the colder districts of the north are ice-bound for some 220 days in the year; in the south for only about 90 days. The rainfall is greatest on the coast of the Cattegat (30 inches).

Sweden is separated popularly and geographically into three great divisions—Norrland, Svealand, and Gothland. Norrland in the north is a region of vast and lonely forests and rapid mountain-streams, often forming fine cascades and ribbon-like lakes ere they reach the Gulf of Bothnia. Besides the Lapps with their reindeer herds, and the Swedish wood-cutters and miners, the only denizens of these forest tracts are wild animals (reindeer, bears, wolves, lynxes, gluttons, foxes, lemmings), birds of prey, hares, game birds, and aquatic birds. This division is very rich in minerals, but iron is almost the only one extracted. The central division of Svealand, or Sweden proper, is a region of big lakes, and contains most of the mines. Lakes occupy nearly 14,000 sq. m., or 8·2 per cent. of the total area; several of the largest, as Vener, Vetter, Hjelmar, Mälar, are connected with one another and the sea by rivers and canals. Lake Mälar contains some 1300 islands, many beautifully wooded, with royal palaces or noblemen's castles; and its shores are studded with prosperous towns, castles, palaces, and factories. There is a pretty large area of forest in Svealand, which also possesses almost inexhaustible stores of iron and copper, and in less quantities silver, manganese, nickel, zinc, cobalt, &c. Gothland, the southern division, contains a much higher proportion of cultivated land, and its wide plains are all under agriculture. Iron occurs and some coal is extracted.

In 1800 the population of Sweden numbered 2,347,303; in 1850, 3,482,541; in 1910, 5,521,943. By nationality the people are all Swedes, except some 25,000 Finns, 7000 Lapps, and 40,000 foreigners. Only 25 per cent. are counted as 'townsfolk.' In 1910 the towns whose pop. exceeded 20,000 were Stockholm (342,000), Gothenburg (168,000), Malmö (88,000), Norrköping, Gefle, Helsingborg, Örebro, Eskilstuna, Karlskrona, Jönköping, Uppsala, Linköping, Borås, and Lund; and sixteen more exceeded 10,000. Between 10,000 and 20,000 persons emigrate every year, mostly to the United States. The state religion, that of the whole population but some 60,000, is that of the Lutheran Church, with twelve bishops. Primary education is compulsory and free, and there are excellent elementary schools. The highest branches are provided for by the Medical Institution of Stockholm and by the universities of Uppsala (2000 students) and Lund (1000). More than one-half of the population are dependent on agriculture. About 9 per cent. only of the entire area is under cultivation, though in addition over 3 per cent. is laid down as meadows. The principal crops are potatoes, oats, rye (yielding the ordinary bread of the peasantry), barley, and wheat, beet for sugar, and roots for fodder. Butter is one of the largest exports. The output of the iron-mines has rapidly grown (5,500,000 tons in 1910). Copper, zinc, manganese, cobalt, nickel, and silver are also produced. About half of the aggregate surface is forest, and of this again the greater part is in Norrland. Only a small part of the timber cut in Sweden is sent abroad, about one-half of it to Britain, chiefly in the form of pit-props. The most important industries are timber industries (including the making of wood-pulp, paper, pasteboard, &c.), flour-mills, iron-works, foundries, &c., mechanical works, sugar-refineries, cotton and wool spinning and weaving, margarine-factories, breweries, tobacco-factories, match-factories, tanneries, metal works, shoe-factories, distilleries, glass and porcelain works, and chemical works. The fisheries (both off the south and off the east coast) are of considerable but variable value. The foreign trade of the country averages annually from £23,000,000 to £38,000,000 for imports, and from £18,000,000 to £32,000,000 for exports. The imports from Great Britain average about £7,000,000, and the exports thither £8,000,000 or £10,000,000. The chief imports are textiles, groceries, minerals, machinery, grain and flour, hair, hides, horn, and animals and animal foods. Of the exports timber, wrought and unwrought, is by far the most important—£15,000,000 or more. Next come animals and animal products (mainly butter); minerals and metals, chiefly coal, iron, and steel; paper, grain and flour, and textiles. Great Britain takes principally wood, timber, and wood-pulp, butter, paper, pig and bar iron and steel, and matches, and sends back coal, iron, machinery, and textiles.

The executive power is vested in the king, advised by a council of eleven; and there are two houses of parliament. The members of the first house (150) are elected by the provincial councils and the municipal councils of certain large towns, one-sixth retiring every year. The members of the second house (230) are elected for three years by universal male suffrage, with proportional representation, from rural districts and towns.

The revenue averages about £13,000,000, and generally balances the expenditure. The debt, £30,000,000, has been contracted solely for railways and the like. Military service is universal. It begins in the twenty-first year. Eight years are spent in the first ban of the Beväring, with 240 to 365 days' training; four in the second, and eight in the Landstorm, without further training. Naval training amounts to 300 days.

Sweden was originally occupied by Lapps and Finns, but probably (1500 B.C.) Teutonic tribes drove them into the forests of the north, and at the dawn of history we find Svealand occupied by Swedes (Svea) and Gothland by the cognate Goths. Some, however, make Sweden or Scandinavia generally the original home of the Aryans. Gothland was christianised and also conquered by the Danes in the 9th c., while Svealand remained fanatically heathen till the time of St Eric (12th c.), who conquered Finland, henceforth a Swedish possession. For a century Goths and Swedes had different kings, but gradually melted into one people toward the end of the 13th c. Now arose bitter feuds between king, nobility, and peasants, and universal turbulence prevailed; agriculture, industry, literature and culture progressed not at all or hardly existed. Even after the union of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark under one monarch (1397), Sweden was torn by conflicts which lasted down to the expulsion of Danish oppressors, and the restoration of Swedish autonomy by the national rising under Gustavus Vasa (1524), the ablest prince who had yet ruled the Swedes. Under him the Reformation was heartily accepted. Gustavus Adolphus and the Swedes were its bulwark, not merely at home but in Germany in the Thirty Years' War; and by the acquirement of Bremen, Verden, and Pomerania, Sweden became (1648) a member of the empire. Under Charles XII. and his successor, the enmity of Denmark, Poland, and Russia wrested her new conquests from Sweden, and gave Livonia, Esthonia, Ingermanland, and Karelia (which had long been Swedish) to Russia; thus reducing Sweden from the rank of a first-rate European power. After a bloody struggle, Sweden had to cede Finland (1809) to Russia. Norway was united by a personal union (i.e. by the monarch) with Sweden in 1810; and in 1818 the French general Bernadotte was elected king (as Charles XIV.). Norway's demand for a larger measure of home rule led in 1905 to a complete separation. Swedish, a descendant of the Old Norse, differs (since the 9th c.) more from the parent tongue than Icelandic, Norwegian, or Danish; it has had, especially since the 16th c., an extensive literature.

Swilly, Lough, an inlet of the Atlantic, 25 miles long and 3 to 4 wide, on the north coast of Donegal, Ireland, enters between Dunaff Head on the E. and Fanad Point, with a lighthouse, on the W. A second lighthouse is on Dunree Head. The entrance is protected by forts. On the E. shore is the watering-place, Buncrana. In Lough Swilly a French fleet was destroyed in 1798; and in 1811 the foundering of H.M.S. Saldanha at the entrance cost 300 lives.

Swindon, a municipal borough of Wiltshire, 77 miles W. of London and 29 ENE. of Bath, consists of Old Swindon, on an eminence 1¼ mile S., and New Swindon, which originated in the transference hither in 1841 from Wootton-Bassett of the engineering works of the Great Western Railway. The former is rather a picturesque place, with a good Decorated parish church (rebuilt by Sir G. G. Scott in 1851), a town-hall (1852), assembly rooms (1850), and a corn exchange (1867); New Swindon has a mechanics' institute (1843), a theatre, &c. Population of the municipal borough, 51,000. See J. E. Jackson's Swindon and its Neighbourhood (1861), and Jefferies' Land, ed. G. Toplis (1897).

Swineford, a Mayo market-town, 22 miles SW. of Ballymote. Pop. 1300.

Swinemünde (Sveen-eh-meen'deh), a fortified seaport and watering-place of Prussia, on Usedom Island, 124 miles by rail NNE. of Berlin. Pop. 13,000. (See Oder.)

Swineshead, a town of Lincolnshire, 6 miles WSW. of Boston. At its Cistercian abbey King John surfeited himself with peaches and new beer. Pop. 1900.

Swinton, (1) a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 5 miles NNE. of Rotherham. It has manufactures of bottles, iron, pottery, &c. Population, 13,600.—(2) A town of Lancashire, 4½ miles WNW. of Manchester, with cotton-mills and brickfields. Pop. of Swinton and Pendlebury, 31,000.

Switzerland, a confederation or republic of twenty-two cantons, three being divided into half-cantons, situated in the centre of Europe between France, Germany, Austria, and Italy. The greatest length (E. to W.) is 216 miles, the width being 137 miles; area, 15,981 sq. m. The pop. in 1850 was 2,392,740; in 1900, 3,325,023. In the following table of the census of 1910 the ordinary name is put first, followed by the French name in the German cantons, or by the German in the French ones. F. or G. or F.G. indicates that the majority speak French, or German, or both. When neither P. nor R.C. is appended, it is to be understood that the canton is partly Protestant and partly Catholic.

The area of Switzerland (15,981 sq. m., of which 71·6 per cent. is 'productive' and 38·4 per cent.

'unproductive') is distributed over four river-basins—those of the Rhine, the Rhone, the Inn, and the Ticino, a tributary of the Po. The Confederation is bounded S. by a part of the main chain of the Eastern Alps, W. and NW. by the Jura, and N. by the Rhine. The Pennine Alps lie to the south of the valley of the Rhone, on the north of which are the Bernese Alps extending from the Lake of Geneva to the Grimsel. East of the Bernese Alps is the St Gothard group. The Rhætian Alps are east of the Pennine Chain (see ALPS, JURA, &c.). A broad fertile plain extends from the Lake of Geneva to the Lake of Constance. The lowest level on Swiss territory is 646 feet on the banks of Lake Lugano; the highest is 15,217, the summit of Monte Rosa. Of the 4538 sq. m. of land classed as 'unproductive,' 3229 are covered by rocks, moraine, &c., 711 by glaciers, 535 by lakes, and 63 by towns and villages. The largest lakes are those of Geneva and Constance; fifteen cover an area of over 3 sq. m. each. Of some 470 glaciers (more in Valais than in any other canton) the largest is the Gross Aletsch, 15 miles long. In the Central Alps the limit of perpetual snow varies from 9250 to 9020 feet. Few metallic deposits are found; those which exist cannot be worked. Some salt is obtained. In a country where the height above the sea-level is from 646 feet—where the almond, the fig, and the olive ripen in the open air—to the region of perpetual snow, there is inevitably great variety in the climate. There is a variation of about 34½° in the mean temperature—between 54½° F. at Bellinzona, and 20° on the Theodule Pass. The population is composed of four distinct ethnical elements. The language of 69 per cent. of the population is German; of 21·1 French; of 8 Italian; of 1·1 Romansch or Ladin. There is no federal church, each canton has its own ecclesiastical constitution, and liberty of belief is inviolable. Of the inhabitants, 56·3 per cent. are Protestants, 42·5 Catholics, and 0·5 Jews. The republic of Switzerland became a federal state (Bundestaat) in 1848: previously it consisted of a league of semi-independent states or cantons. The political structure is built up in three tiers—the Commune, the Canton, and the Federal Assembly. In the communes all local matters are administered by two governing bodies—the Communal Assembly (which is purely legislative), composed of all male citizens who have attained the age of twenty, and the Communal Council, the executive of the former body, by whom it is elected. Each canton has its own constitution and local government. The constitutions of the several cantons vary considerably, but all are based on the sovereignty of the people, and are subject also to the ratification of the Confederation. In Uri, the two half-cantons of Appenzell, and in Glarus there still exists the ancient Landsgemeinde, an open-air gathering of all those possessing votes, who meet every spring to legislate on cantonal affairs. These cantons possess a representative power in their Landrat, and an executive power in the Regierungsrat. In other cantons the citizens elect representatives to the cantonal council from electoral districts. The supreme legislative authority of the Confederation is vested in a parliament of two chambers, the Council of the States (Ständerat), and the National Council (Nationalrat), which represent the supreme government of the country, under reserve of the referendum or vote of the people. The Council of the States consists of forty-four members, each canton having two representatives, and each half-canton one. The National Council consists of 188 members, elected in each canton in the proportion of one deputy for every 20,000 of the population. These two chambers each elect a president and vice-president, and meet at Bern at least twice a year, in June and December, together forming the Federal Assembly. This body controls the general administration of the Confederation; they alone can declare war, make peace, or conclude treaties with foreign powers. The executive authority of the Federal Assembly is deputed to the Federal Council composed of seven members, elected for a period of three years. The president of the Federal Council, who is also president of the Confederation, is chosen annually at a united meeting of the Council of the States and the National Council from among the members of the Federal Council. By means of the referendum all legislative acts passed in the Federal or Cantonal Assemblies may be referred to the people en masse. In the majority of cantons 5000 signatures are required in order to obtain a referendum for cantonal laws. The compulsory referendum regarding federal legislation, established in 1848, was then limited to the revision of the constitution. That of 1874 contains an article extending it, when demanded by 30,000 citizens or eight cantons, to all laws and resolutions of a general nature passed by the Federal Assembly. Initiative is the exercise of the right granted to voters to initiate proposals for the enactment of new laws or for the alteration or abolition of old ones. Fifty thousand signatures are required to obtain the initiative for federal legislation, and in most cantons 5000 for cantonal matters.

The revenue for 1911 was £3,622,600, the expenditure £3,699,000. The revenue is chiefly derived from customs, postal and telegraph services, the tax for exemption from military service, and from real property. The public debt in 1910 amounted to £5,000,000. The total cantonal debts exceed £16,000,000. The French metric system of money, &c., is in use throughout the Confederation. Every Swiss is liable to military service; and the total strength of the army (essentially a citizen force, designed only for defensive purposes), not including the Landsturm, is: Élite, 140,400; Landwehr, 69,500—total, 209,900. Primary instruction is compulsory, unsectarian, and provided gratuitously at the cost of each canton. There are seven universities on the German model—Basel, Bern, Zurich, Geneva, Lausanne, Neuchâtel, and (for Catholics only) Freiburg; there is also a great federal technical college, the Polytechnic, at Zurich, besides several smaller technical colleges elsewhere.

More than one-half of the arable land is devoted to cereals. Cattle-breeding is an industry of great importance. There are thousands of cheesemaking establishments. Tobacco is grown chiefly in the cantons of Valais, Vaud, Freiburg, Bern, and Aargau; the quality is by no means good, but the exports (including cigars and cigarettes) amount to £160,000 a year. The annual import of wine greatly exceeds the export. Little or no coal is mined, there are no canals or navigable rivers, the country is situated far from the sea-coast, and nearly all the raw material and half-finished goods have to be imported. Yet there is a large general trade. The textile industries are the most important, the chief centres being Zurich, Basel, Glarus. Next comes watchmaking, established at Geneva in 1587, which has since spread to the cantons of Neuchâtel, Bern, and Vaud. Machinery (weaving-looms, &c.) is also largely exported. Embroidery is carried on chiefly in St Gall and Appenzell. Wood-carving was introduced in the Oberland about 1820. Other manufactures are chemicals, chocolate, and condensed milk. The exports reach £50,000,000 in value per annum, the imports £70,000,000. The amount of money brought annually by tourists into the 'Playground of Europe' is estimated at £4,000,000.

The original inhabitants of Switzerland were the Celtic Helvetii, and the Rhætii of doubtful affinity; both were conquered by Julius Cæsar and the generals of Augustus, and Romanised. Overrun by the Burgundians in the west, and their Germanic kinsmen the Alemannians in the east, Helvetia became subject to the Frankish kings and christianised in the 7th century. Most of the country was subsequently part of the Holy Roman Empire; and in 1273 a Swiss noble, Rudolf of Hapsburg in Aargau, became German Emperor. Soon after his death (in 1291) the inhabitants of Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden formed a league to defend their common interests, and in 1315 crushed an Austrian army at Morgarten. In 1332 Lucerne joined the alliance, and in 1353, Bern, Zurich, Glarus, and Zug. The Austrians were again routed at Sempach in 1386, and in 1388 at Näfels. The Swiss next had a fierce but triumphant struggle with Charles the Bold of Burgundy, whom they routed at Grandson and Morat in 1476, and finally at Nancy (where Charles was slain) in 1477. When the Reformation began there were thirteen cantons, and the cantons took opposite sides from the beginning, not without serious turmoil and bloodshed. The treaty of Westphalia in 1648 recognised Switzerland as an independent state. Some of the cantons were strictly aristocratic and some highly democratic, and there was much discontent long before the French Revolution, when, in 1798, between civil strife and French armies, the old republic (or rather alliance) came to an end. The Helvetic Republic of nineteen cantons, under French auspices, endured till 1805; then a new republican constitution was adopted, the Federal Pact of twenty-two cantons. On Napoleon's downfall Valais, Neuchâtel, and Geneva, which had been incorporated with France, were restored, and Swiss neutrality and inviolability were recognised by the treaty of Vienna in 1815. Religious troubles led to a Catholic league in 1844, which was suppressed by the Federal forces in 1847. The present constitution was adopted in 1848, but revised in 1874.

See, besides Murray, Baedeker, and other guidebooks, works on the constitution by Adams and Cunningham (1889), Moses (Oakland, U.S. 1889), Vincent (1891), Winchester (1891); on the history by Hug ('Story of the Nations,' 1890), and Swiss life by Symonds (1892).

Swords, a town, 8 miles N. of Dublin, with a round tower, castle, and abbey. Pop. 900.

Sydenham (Sid'nam), a district in the metropolitan borough of Lewisham. It has become of world-wide celebrity in connection with the Crystal Palace, which, however, is mainly in other boroughs and Penge. It was erected in 1852–54, chiefly from the materials of the Great Exhibition (1851), and under the superintendence of Sir Joseph Paxton. The cost amounted to nearly £1,500,000. The building is 1608 feet long, 390 wide across the transept, and 175 high, the height of the two water-towers being 282 feet. Formerly the chief arts and sciences were illustrated by various collections, but these have been much reduced in recent years. In the centre transept are held the triennial Handel festivals (since 1859) with 4000 performers; and there are a concert hall and a theatre. The park and gardens (nearly 200 acres) are adorned with sculptures, balustrades, lakes, and fountains. In 1866 a fire destroyed part of the north wing. Important exhibitions and 'demonstrations' take place here; also annual shows (of dogs, poultry, &c.), football matches, and firework displays. The Crystal Palace, once before insolvent, in 1887, was in 1912 in the hands of a receiver. The Earl of Plymouth made himself responsible for its purchase (for about £200,000) that it might be acquired for public use; and though the sum subscribed fell short, the purchase was completed in December 1913, the earl forgoing the remainder of the price.

Sydney, the capital of New South Wales, and the oldest city in Australia, is situated on the southern shores of Port Jackson, and was named after Thomas Townshend, first Viscount Sydney (1733–1800), then Secretary of State for the Colonies. The first British settlers that reached New Holland were landed at Botany Bay (q.v.) on January 20, 1788. The spot here selected, being found ineligible, was abandoned a few days afterwards, and the infant settlement was transferred to a point 7 miles farther N., where Sydney now stands. The choice of the new locality was chiefly determined by a stream of fresh water flowing into Sydney Cove, one of the numberless bays into which the basin of Port Jackson is divided. This magnificent expanse of water, completely landlocked, and admitting vessels of the largest size, extends 20 miles inland, ramifying in every direction. Its bold and rocky shores, covered with luxuriant vegetation, present a succession of beautiful landscapes. The surrounding hills often rise to from 200 to 250 feet. In other points the coast consists of terraces and smooth sandy beaches. The narrow entrance of Port Jackson—through the 'Heads,' which are indicated by the Macquarie lighthouse, its electric light visible 30 miles at sea—is defended by the shore fortifications, torpedo boats, and a naval establishment on Garden Island. Sydney stands nearly in the centre of the immense coal formation of East Australia, which extends 500 miles N. and S., with a breadth of from 80 to 100 miles; and the sandstone rock on which it is erected affords a valuable building material.

The older streets are narrow and irregular; but several of the modern streets are not behind those of the principal towns of Europe. There are excellent lighting and drainage systems; and an abundant supply of pure water is obtained from the Nepean River, near Penrith. The Botanical Gardens cover 38 acres, and there are also numerous parks. Sydney has one shipbuilding establishment. The Fitzroy Dry Dock, originally intended for vessels of the royal navy, can take in ships of the largest size, and has been supplemented by one of the most extensive graving-docks in existence. Steps have been taken to put the city in a state of defence, and forts and batteries armed with powerful Armstrong guns have been erected. Amongst public buildings by far the most important edifice is the university (1852), which stands on a commanding height. The principal façade is 500 feet in length, and is flanked at its western end by the Great Hall. Affiliated to it are a women's college and three denominational colleges. The metropolitan cathedral of St Andrew is a handsome Perpendicular edifice; the R. C. cathedral of St Mary, twice burned, and since rebuilt, is one of the finest churches in Australia. There are also a technical university and technological museum, the museum, Colonial Secretary's office, lands office, post-office, customs office, town-hall (possessing the largest organ in the world), and public grammar-school. The Thomas Walker Convalescent Hospital was built out of a bequest of £100,000. The neighbourhood of Sydney, especially the shores of the bays and the Parramatta and Lane Cove rivers, is studded with villas, surrounded by park-like grounds, and gardens of orange-trees, bananas, and numberless semi-tropical plants. There are numerous industrial establishments, but Sydney is essentially a commercial rather than a manufacturing city. Pop. (1862) 93,596; (1881), 220,427; (1911) 640,000.

Sydney, a port of Cape Breton (q.v.), with a coal-field and great iron and steel works; pop. 17,700.

Syene (Sī-ee'nee). See Assouan.

Sylhet (Seel'het), or Srihatta, a British district in the extreme south of Assam (q.v.). Area, 5414 sq. m.; pop. 2,000,000. The chief town, Sylhet, on the Surmá River, has a pop. of 15,000.

Sylt (Seelt), a narrow island, 23 miles long, off the W. coast of Sleswick, with a pop. of 5000. The chief town is Keitum.

Syra (Gr. Syros), the most important, though not the largest, of the Cyclades. It is 10 miles long by 5 broad, 42½ sq. m. in area, and is bare and rocky. Pop. of island, 30,000. The capital Syra, or Hermoupolis (pop. 18,000), on a bay on the E. side, is the chief entrepôt of the Ægean, importing manufactured wares, hides, grain, flour, yarns, timber, iron, &c., and exporting tobacco, emery-stone, valonia, sponges, &c.

Syracuse (Sir'a-kyooz), anciently a famous city of Sicily, on the E. coast, 80 miles SSW. of Messina, was founded by Corinthian settlers about 733 b.c. The colonists seem to have occupied the little isle of Ortygia, stretching south-east from the shore; but later the city extended to the mainland. The seat successively of 'tyranny' and democracy, Syracuse was involved in a great struggle with Athens (415–414 b.c.), and the celebrated siege in which it came off victorious. Dionysius' fierce war with Carthage (397 b.c.) raised the renown of Syracuse still higher. In 212 b.c. the city was conquered by the Romans after a two years' siege, it having sided with the Carthaginians. Under the Romans Syracuse slowly declined, though with its handsome public buildings and its artistic and intellectual culture, it always continued to be the first city of Sicily. It was captured and burned by the Saracens in 878 a.d., and after that sunk into complete decay. The modern city (Siracusa) is confined to the original limits, Ortygia, which, however, is no longer an island, but a peninsula. The streets, which are defended by walls and a citadel, are mostly narrow and dirty. Syracuse has a cathedral (the ancient temple of Minerva), a museum of antiquities, a public library, the fountain of Arethusa (its waters mingled with sea-water since the earthquake of 1170), and remains of temples, aqueducts, the citadel Euryalus, a theatre, an amphitheatre, and quarries, besides ancient Christian catacombs. Pop. 40,600.

Syracuse, an important city of central New York, lies in the beautiful Onondaga valley, stretching along Onondaga Creek to the head of Onondaga Lake. It is on the Erie Canal, and is a terminus of the Oswego Canal; by rail it is 148½ miles E. of Buffalo and 147½ W. of Albany. Syracuse is the seat of a Methodist Episcopal university (1870). Salt is the chief manufacture, and there are also rolling-mills, Bessemer steel-works, foundries, blast-furnaces, boiler-factories, and manufactories of engines, farming implements, furniture, silver-ware, saddlery, boots, flour, beer, &c. The salt-springs were visited by French missionaries in 1654, and began to be worked by white men in 1789; the city was incorporated in 1847. Pop. 137,300.

Syr-Daria (Seer-Dar'ya). See Jaxartes.

Syria (Sirria), a country of western Asia, forming part of Turkey in Asia, and embracing the regions that lie between the Levant and the Euphrates from Mount Taurus in the north to the southern border of Palestine, or even to the peninsula of Sinai. A range of mountains, split in the north into two parallel chains—Libanus and Anti-Libanus—fronts the Mediterranean, ranging in height from 6000 feet in the north up to 10,000 feet in the central parts, but falling again in the south to 3500 feet. Behind these mountains lies a tableland, that gradually falls away eastwards to the desert. The separate districts and features of Syria are described under Lebanon, Palestine, Phœnicia, Bashan, Hauran, Dead Sea, Jordan, &c. The prevailing winds being westerly, the slopes of the mountains next the Mediterranean, together with the immediate seaboard, get a tolerably plentiful supply of moisture during the rainy half of the year (October to May); snow even falls on the highest summits. The climate on the plateau is generally dry. The valley of the Jordan is remarkably hot. The soil is in many parts possessed of good fertility, and in ancient times, when irrigation was more extensively practised, yielded a much greater return than it does now. Damascus is noted for its gardens and orchards. Hauran produces excellent wheat. Northern Syria is the home of the olive. The vine grows almost everywhere. Fruit (oranges, figs, &c.) is cultivated on the coast plains. Sheep and goats are the chief domestic animals. The principal exports are silk, cereals, wool, olive-oil, lemons, oranges, raisins, almonds, hides, eggs, soap, sponges, sesame, liquorice, cottons, and tobacco. The total value is £1,000,000 to £2,500,000. The imports reach a somewhat higher figure; Manchester goods the chief item. Besides these there are woollens, rice, copper and iron, sacking, timber, and hides. The chief port is Beyrout, with Acre, Haifa, Tyre, and Tripoli. Railways connect Damascus with Aleppo, Beyrout, Haifa, and Medina, and Jaffa with Jerusalem. A railway to the Persian Gulf has been recommended. The pop., including Lebanon and Palestine, is estimated at 3,317,000. The bulk of the inhabitants are Mohammedans, including the Druses, Shiites, &c. The Christians make up one-fifth of the total—Orthodox Greeks, United Greeks, Maronites and Nestorians, Roman Catholics, and a few Protestants. The main ethnic elements in the population are descendants of the ancient Syrians (Aramæans) and Arabs, both settled and nomad; besides there are Jews, Turks, and Europeans.

Syria was the scene of the Hittite, Phœnician, and Jewish states, and of the Aramæan (Syrian and Semitic) principalities of Damascus, Zobah, Hamath, &c. In the 8th and 9th centuries b.c. Syria was the battle-ground of the Egyptian and Hittite armies, and after that period it was, as a province of Assyria (Babylonia), involved in the struggle between that great empire and Egypt. (The Greeks first knew this region as a province of Assyria; hence the contracted name Syria.) Towards the end of the 6th century B.C. Syria fell under the dominion of the Persian empire; and two centuries later it was conquered by Alexander of Macedon. When his empire broke to pieces the Seleucidæ made Antioch the capital of their empire of Syria. From the Seleucidæ it passed, through the hands of Tigranes of Armenia, to the Romans, for whom it was won by Pompey in 64 B.C. Under these new masters the country flourished and became celebrated for its thriving industries, its commercial prosperity, and its architectural magnificence (see BAALBEK and PALMYRA). On the division of the Roman world Syria became part of the Byzantine empire, and remained a province of it until its conquest by the Mohammedan Arabs in 636. It still continued to be prosperous under the Arabs and their successors the Egyptian sovereigns, in spite of the unsettled period of the Crusades. The first severe blow it suffered came from the Mongols in 1260, and its ruin was completed when in 1516 it passed from the Egyptians to the Ottoman Turks. See Burton and Drake, Unexplored Syria (2 vols. 1872); Lady Burton, Inner Life of Syria (1875); Baedeker's Palestine and Syria (by Professor A. Socin); Conder, Heth and Moab (1883); and books quoted under the various articles cited above.

Syrtis, the ancient name of two gulfs of the Mediterranean Sea, on the north coast of Africa. The Syrtis Major (now Gulf of Sidra) lies between Tripoli and Barca; the Syrtis Minor (now Gulf of Cabes), between Tunis and Tripoli.

Syzran (Seez'ran), a town (1685) of Central Russia, 90 miles S. of Simbirsk. Pop. 42,500.

Szabadka (Saw-bawd'ka), or MARIA-THERESIOPEL, a royal free town of Hungary, 106 miles S. by E. of Budapest. Pop. 100,000.

Szarvas (Sawr-vaush), a town of Hungary, 80 miles SE. of Budapest. Pop. 26,000.

Szathmár-Némethy (Sawt'mar-Nemetee), a cathedral city of Hungary, on the Szamos, 68 miles by rail NE. of Debreczin. Pop. 35,000.

Sze-chwan, the largest province of China, 185,000 sq. m. in area, is situated in the west, having Tibet on the NW. and Yunnan on the SW. It is traversed by the Yang-tsze-Kiang, is hilly throughout, and rich in coal, iron, and other minerals. The capital is Ching-tu. The chief commercial town, Chung-king, on the Great River, was thrown open to British trade in 1889, as Ichang (q.v.) was to foreign trade in 1877. Pop. 71,000,000. See A. Hosie's Three Years in Western China (1890).

Szegedin (Seg-e-deen'), a royal free town of Hungary, stands at the confluence of the Maros with the Theiss, 118 miles by rail SE. of Budapest. In March 1879 a terrible flood overwhelmed 6235 out of 6566 houses. Since then Szegedin has been rebuilt, and now possesses very handsome public buildings, and is protected against inundations by a double ring of embankments. The Theiss is spanned by two railway bridges and a fine suspension bridge (1940 feet long) designed by Eiffel. Szegedin manufactures soap, spirits, matches, soda, tobacco, coarse cloth, &c. From 1526 to 1686 it was occupied by the Turks. Pop. 120,000.

Szenta. See ZENTA.

Szentes (Sen'tesh), a town of Hungary, 30 miles N. of Szegedin, near the Theiss. Pop. 32,000.

Szolnok (Sol'nok), a town of Hungary, on the Theiss, 66 miles E. by S. of Budapest, with a trade in tobacco, timber, and salt. Pop. 30,000.

Table Mountain. See CAPETOWN.

Taboga. See PANAMÁ.

Ta'bor, a dome-shaped oak-clad hill, 1000 feet high, of N. Palestine, 7 miles E. of Nazareth. Regarded in the 2d c. as the Mount of Transfiguration, it is crowned by a ruined crusading church.

Tabriz (Tabreez'; anc. Tauris), a city of Persia, capital of Azerbijan province, 40 miles E. of Lake Urmia. The Kabúd Masjid, or 'blue mosque' (1450), is an interesting ruin; the citadel is a spacious edifice, its brick walls cracked by earthquakes. Tabriz manufactures leather, silk, and gold and silversmith's work; it is also the emporium of an extensive transit trade. The imports include cotton fabrics, sugar, woollen cloth, and wines, spirits; the exports, drugs, spices, dried fruits, shawls, carpets, raw silk. The opening of the Russian railway between the Black Sea and the Caspian, and Russian tariff legislation, have injured the overland trade by Tabriz. The Anglo-Indian telegraph line passes here. Pop. 170,000.

Tacna, a southern province of Peru, taken possession of by Chili in 1883 avowedly for only ten years. Area, 8685 sq. m.; population, 30,000. The capital, Tacna, 38 miles by rail N. of Arica (q.v.), has a pop. of 10,000.

Taco'ma, the third city of Washington state, on the E. side of Puget Sound, by rail 145 miles N. of Portland, Oregon, and 18 S. by W. of Seattle. In 1880 it was a mere village; in 1890 a flourishing city, with trams, water, gas and the electric light, miles of wide streets, numerous mills and factories, and a busy port. In the district around are coal, iron, precious metals, lumber, farms of wheat, hops, fruit, and vegetables; it has a tea trade direct with Japan. Pop. (1880) 1098; (1910) 83,734. Behind the city is beautiful Mount Tacoma or Rainier (14,444 feet).

Tacuarem'bo, the largest dep. of Uruguay, bounded S. by the Rio Negro. Area, 8074 sq. m.; pop. 50,000.

Tad'caster (Roman Calcaria), a Yorkshire town, on the Wharfe, 9 miles SW. of York. Towton, 2½ miles S., witnessed a great Yorkist victory in 1461. Pop. 3400.

Taff, a river of South Wales, flowing 40 miles to the Bristol Channel at Cardiff.

Tafilet. See MOROCCO.

Taganrog, a Russian seaport, on the N. shore of the Sea of Azov, 15 miles W. of the Don's mouth. It exports wheat, linseed, hempseed, skins, wool, butter, and tallow. Founded in 1698, it was bombarded during the Crimean war by an Anglo-French fleet. Pop. 70,700.

Taghmon, a market-town, 9 miles W. of Wexford. Pop. 500.

Tagus (Span. Tajo), the largest river of the Spanish Peninsula, rises on the hilly frontier of Guadalajara and Teruel provinces. It first flows NW., then curving SW., flows mainly in that direction past Aranjuez, Toledo, and Alcantara, and, in Portugal, Abrantes, Santarem, and Lisbon, 10 miles below which it enters the Atlantic. Below Salvaterra it divides into the western Tejo Novo and the eastern Mar de Pedro, which form a delta, and both fall into the noble Bay of Lisbon. It is 566 miles long, and navigable to Abrantes from Santarem for ocean-going steamers.

Tahiti (Tahee'tee; formerly spelt Otaheite), an island giving name to a small archipelago, also called Society Islands, in the mid Pacific, more than 2000 miles NE. of New Zealand and some 3400 SSW. of San Francisco. The islands consist of Tahiti (which embraces 455 sq. m. out of a total of 637 for the entire archipelago), Raiatea, Moorea or Eimeo (q.v.), and others. The group is divided into the Windward and the Leeward clusters, and stretches for about 200 miles NW. and SE. They are composed of volcanic rocks, are mountainous (Orohena on Tahiti is 7340 feet high), and well wooded, with belts of low fertile soil along the shores, and girt by coral-reefs. The scenery is magnificent, the chief island being often called 'the Garden of the Pacific.' The climate is very moist and hot (70° to 84° F.), but equable and healthy. Coconuts, oranges, vanilla, fruit, cotton, and sugar are grown, and these and mother-of-pearl, coconut fibre, and trepang are exported. The imports include textiles, flour, wine, live-stock, sugar, coffee, coal, timber, and soap. The people cultivate the bread-fruit, taro, yam, sweet potato, &c. The most important harbour is Papeete, the capital, in the NE. of Tahiti, which has a R. C. cathedral, an arsenal, and a pop. of 3600. The population of all the islands is about 20,000 (Tahiti, 11,700; French, 400). The people, a handsome race of the Polynesian stock, are light-hearted and polite, but very immoral and untrustworthy. The group was discovered by the Spanish navigator De Quiros, but first accurately described by Cook (1769–77), who named them in honour of the Royal Society of London; the pop. then numbered nearly 250,000. The London Missionary Society commenced work here in 1797; but in 1812 they had to flee for a while to Australia. In 1842 France forced a protectorate over the eastern cluster, extended in 1888 to the whole. The colony (1897) was in 1903 united with others as the French Establishments in Oceania. See works by Ellis (1829), Williams (1839), Pritchard (1866), Dora Hort (1891), and Miss Grimshaw (1907).

Taimyr. See CHELYUSKIN.

Tain (Scand. Thing, 'a place of assembly'), an ancient royal burgh of Ross-shire, near the south shore of the Dornoch Firth, 44 miles NNE. of Inverness by the Highland Railway (1864). A ruined chapel marks the birthplace of St Duthac (c. 1000–65), whose body was brought back from Armagh in 1253; within it Bruce's queen was taken captive for Edward I., and James IV. did yearly penance here. There are also a collegiate church (1471; restored 1849–82), a court-house (1849), a public hall (1876), and an academy (1812). The population is about 1600. The parl. burgh is of the Wick group.

Tampi'co (i as ee), a Mexican seaport, on the Panuco, 9 miles from the Gulf of Mexico, and 200 miles NNE. of Mexico. Pop. 20,000.

Tamsui. See FORMOSA.

Tamworth, a town on the border of Stafford and Warwick shires, at the confluence of the Tame and Anker, 17½ miles NNE. of Birmingham, and 110 NW. of London. Burned by the Danes in 911, and rebuilt by the Princess Ethelfleda, it was the seat of a castle of the Saxon kings, held afterwards by the Marmions, Ferrars, &c., and now by the Marquis of Townshend. That castle crowns a knoll 130 feet high; in its noble round keep Mary, Queen of Scots, was a prisoner. The church of St Edith, restored since 1870 at a cost of £10,000, has interesting monuments and a curious double tower-staircase. There are also a bronze statue of Peel (M.P. 1833–50), the new Jubilee municipal buildings and assembly rooms, a town-hall (1701), a grammar-school (1588; rebuilt 1868), almshouses founded by Thomas Guy (the founder of Guy's Hospital, who was brought up here), a cottage hospital, recreation grounds, &c. The manufactures include elastic, tape, smallwares, paper, &c.; and in the vicinity are market-gardens and coal-pits. A municipal borough, chartered by Elizabeth, Tamworth returned two members until 1885. The borough boundary was extended in 1890. Pop. 7700. See two works by C. F. R. Palmer (1871–75).

Tanderagee′ (g hard), an Armagh market-town, on the Cusher, 83 miles N. of Dublin. Pop. 1400.

Tanga, an excellent German port of East Africa.

Tanganyika (Tang-gan-yee′ka), a lake of Eastern Africa, between 3° and 9° S. lat., and on 30° E. long.; length, 420 miles (nearly a fifth longer than Lake Michigan); breadth, 15 to 80 miles; height above sea, 2700 feet. It was discovered by Speke and Burton in 1858, and explored by Livingstone, Stanley, Cameron, Thomson, Hore, &c. Formerly supposed to belong to the Nile basin, it really sends its surplus waters by the Lukuga outlet westward to the Congo in periods when its level is high. Except when several rainy seasons follow one another, the great evaporation keeps the water about the same level. The water is fresh or slightly brackish, the climate not unhealthy. Mountains, some of them 10,000 feet high, surround the lake, which lies in a trough that seems to indicate a former connection with the Red Sea. Some 600 miles from the coast it divides Belgian Congo from German East Africa, touches Northern Rhodesia on the south, and is on the line of the Cape-to-Cairo railway. For physical features, see J. E. S. Moore, The Tanganyika Problem.

Tangier, or TANGIERS (Tan-jeer′, Tanjeers′; Arab. Tanja), a seaport and health-resort of Morocco, on a small bay of the Strait of Gibraltar, 38 miles SW. of Gibraltar. It has an extensive trade, though the harbour is a mere roadstead. Tangier was taken by the Portuguese in 1471, and given to Charles II. of England as Catharine of Braganza's dowry, and England retained it till 1683. It was subsequently a nest of pirates. By the Franco-Spanish agreement of 1912 the town, with a zone to landward of it on all sides, is autonomous under an International Council and a municipality. Pop. 30,000, mostly Moors and Spanish Jews.

Tan′is (Greek form of Egyptian Tân; Heb. Zoan), an ancient city in the north-east of the Delta, once the chief commercial city of Egypt. The ruins, near the S. shore of Lake Menzaleh, were in 1883–84 explored by Flinders Petrie. See his monograph (1885).

Tanjore (originally Tanjávúr), a town of India, 180 miles SSW. of Madras, on a branch of the lower Kaveri. Its 14th-century great pagoda is 190 feet high. An old Hindu capital, it was a famous seat of learning and religion. Pop. 59,250.

Tansa, a small river whose valley has been impounded for the water-supply of Bombay, 65 miles to the S. The reservoir (1887–92) is 8 sq. m. in area, and the water-supply is 100,000,000 gallons per day.

Tanta, capital of a province in the delta of the Nile, 60 miles N. of Cairo, noted for its fairs and festivals and its large and costly khedivial palace. Pop. 55,000.

Tantallon Castle. See NORTH BERWICK.

Taormina (Tah-or-mee′na; anc. Tauromenium), a coast-town of E. Sicily, on a rock 900 feet high, 35 miles SW. of Messina by rail. It has a splendid ruined theatre, aqueduct, &c. Pop. 5000.

Tapajos (Ta-pah′zhoce), a navigable river of Brazil, formed by the Arinos and Juruena, both rising in the S. of Matto Grosso state. Flowing 900 miles northward, it falls into the Amazon, above Santarem. Steamers run 150 miles to the lowest of several waterfalls.

Taplow, a Thames-side parish of Bucks, 1½ mile E. of Maidenhead. Pop. 1100.

Tar′porley, a Cheshire market-town, 10 miles ESE. of Chester. Pop. of urban district, 2600.

Tarrago′na (anc. Tarraco), a Spanish seaport, the capital of a province on the Mediterranean, 60 miles W. of Barcelona by rail. Its Gothic cathedral dates from about 1120; and its Roman remains include an amphitheatre, a magnificent aqueduct, still used, 96 feet high and 700 feet long, and the Tower of the Scipios. Pop. 23,300.

Tarrasa, an industrial town of Spain, 22 miles NW. of Barcelona. Pop. 23,000.

Tarrytown (rhyming with carry), a village on the Hudson, 21 miles by rail N. of New York City. Close by Major André was captured in 1780; and at Sunnyside, 2 miles S., Washington Irving died, and is buried. Pop. 6000.

Tarshish, often referred to in Scripture, has been doubtfully identified with Tarsus, Tartessus in Spain, a place in S. Arabia, and Ophir (q.v.).

Tarsus, St Paul's birthplace, was capital of Cilicia, and a chief city of Asia Minor, on the Cydnus, 12 miles from the sea. Squalid modern Tarso or Tersus has a pop. of 20,000.

Tartary, a name once given to the whole central belt of Asia and eastern Europe, was loosely used, and was latterly limited to Turkestan (q.v.).

Tarudant, capital of the Moorish province of Sus, on the Sus River. Pop. 8500.

Tashkand, or TASHKENT, the capital of Russian Turkestan, 300 miles NE. of Samarcand. It consists of an ancient walled city and a new European quarter, with the Russian citadel a little to the S. It is connected with the European system of telegraphs, and the railway from Samarcand was opened in 1904; its manufactures include silk, leather, felt goods, and coarse porcelain. Pop. 202,000, comprising 150,000 Sarts and 35,000 Russians. Once capital of a separate khanate, Tashkand was in 1810 conquered by Khokand, and since 1868 has been Russian.

Tasmania, an island-state of the Commonwealth of Australia (1901), is bounded N. by Bass Strait, its other coasts being swept by the great Southern Ocean. Area, 26,215 sq. m. Although it possesses wide stretches of plains and tableland, it has fifty mountains exceeding 2500 feet, the loftiest being Cradle Mountain (5069 feet); the higher tiers are snow-capped through the winter. The lakes of Tasmania (on a plateau more than 3000 feet above sea-level and 60 miles long) should become summer-resorts and sanatoriums for all Australasia. The Great Lake is about 90 miles in circumference. The Derwent, Tamar, Gordon, Pieman, and Huon are navigable rivers. Hobart (the capital) is a magnificent harbour; the Launceston port has been improved by dredging. The west coast has Macquarie Harbour. The soil varies very considerably. In the NW., NE., midland, and SE. divisions, where settlement has mostly taken place, the plains and valleys have been enriched by extensive outbursts of basalt with accompanying tuffs, which have produced a very rich chocolate soil; towards the extreme W. and S. granites, metamorphic mica, and quartzose schists, with overlying slates, grits, and limestone of Cambro-Silurian age, re-appear again and again. The western vegetation as compared with that of the east presents as marked a contrast. The most remarkable trees are the eucalypts, often over 280 feet high, the magnificent tree-ferns, and the fragrant wattle. But the most valuable trees are the blackwood, Huon pine, King William pine, and musk. All Tasmanian trees and shrubs are evergreens. The fauna, like the flora, of Tasmania is almost identical with that of Australia. Of the forty-six species of mammals the platypus is the most remarkable. The twenty-seven marsupials, nine of them peculiar to Tasmania, include the Tasmanian devil or dasyure, and the hyæna-like native tiger, or thylacine. Of the 187 species of birds few are peculiar to the colony. Snakes are few and, though poisonous, not deadly; but there are many lizards. Sea and fresh-water fishes (including the seven species of salmon, salmon-trout, and trout successfully acclimatised) number 213 species, about one-third good edible fish.

There are a few half-castes, the descendants of European sealers by native jins; but the aboriginal Tasmanian has died out—the last male in 1869, the last female in 1876. Probably there were never more than 5000, all of a very inferior race, savage, suspicious, treacherous, and untamable. The racial war in which large numbers were killed, was perhaps inevitable. The climate is peculiarly temperate and genial. The difference between the mean summer and winter temperature is 15°. Hobart has a maximum of 96·3 against 92·2 at Greenwich, and a minimum of 32·0 against 15·5. It is cooler on the hills, and is more equable at other places in the plains. Snow is very rarely seen except on the mountains. The rainfall varies in different localities—at Hobart about 23 inches; on the east coast and parts of the midlands probably less; on the NW. and NE., where timber-clad hills more abound, greater; and on the west coast, where the prevailing wind off the Southern Ocean meets a barrier of forest-clad ranges, greatest of all. The amount of sunshine is much greater than in Britain. The air is drier, the atmosphere clearer, and the extremes of heat and cold less trying.

Tasmania was discovered in 1642 by Tasman (c. 1602–59), despatched by Van Diemen (1593–1645), Dutch governor-general of Batavia. In 1798 Flinders and Dr Bass explored the strait which divides it from the continent. The island was frequently visited by French and English explorers between 1772 and 1802; in 1803 the first settlement was made by Lieutenant Bowen, under instructions from Governor King of New South Wales. For many years sheep-farming was the principal industry. Whaling in the south seas was largely carried on from Hobart for years. Gold, silver, tin, copper, coal, &c. are found. Gold (since 1867), silver, and tin have been largely mined. Tasmania now supplies all her own coal requirements, and since 1882 has a large surplus for export. Sapphires, topazes, cat's-eyes, and zircons are obtained. Orchards have greatly increased, and in 1889 Tasmanian apples were sent in quantity to England. In 1911 the exports (minerals, wool, timber, fruit, jam, grain, hops, skins, bark, &c.) had a value of over £4,500,000; the imports (textiles, art and mechanical products, food and drinks) of £3,300,000. The revenue then was over £1,000,000, and the expenditure also over £1,000,000 (largely for public works). The public debt is £11,100,000. Tasmania (as Van Diemen's Land) was, till 1852, a penal settlement. In 1855 it was the first colony of Australasia to receive representative government. Pop. (1881) 115,705; in 1911 it had increased to 191,211. There are some 470 miles of railway, and 1700 miles of telegraph line.

Tattershall, a Lincolnshire market-town, on the Bain, 9 miles SSW. of Horncastle. Pop. 400.

Taunton (Tahn-ton), a pleasant, well-built town of Somersetshire, in the fair and fertile valley of the Tone ('Taunton Deane') 45 miles SW. of Bristol. Here about 710 Ine, the West Saxon king, built a fortress, which, passing with the manor to the bishops of Winchester, was rebuilt by Bishop William in the first quarter of the 12th century. Added to in the 13th and 15th centuries, this castle received Perkin Warbeck (1497), and was held by Blake during his famous defence of the town (1644–45). In its great hall, fitted up now as a museum, Judge Jeffreys opened the 'Bloody Assize,' hanging 134 and transporting 400 of the inhabitants of Taunton and the neighbourhood who had accorded Monmouth an enthusiastic welcome (1685); and here too Sydney Smith made his 'Mrs Partington' speech (1831). The church of St Mary Magdalene has a noble Perpendicular tower 153 feet high (c. 1500; rebuilt 1858–62); and other buildings are the Elizabethan shire-hall (1858), the municipal buildings (formerly the grammar-school founded by Bishop Fox in 1522), King's College school (1880), Independent college (1847–70), Wesleyan Institution (1843), Huish schools (1874), Bishop Fox's girls' school, hospital (1809–73), barracks, &c. Once a great 'clothier town,' Taunton now has shirt, collar, glove, and silk manufactures, with a large agricultural trade. It was thrice chartered (1627, 1677, 1877) as a municipal borough, and lost one of its two members in 1885. The population is now 22,600. See works by Toulmin (2d ed. 1822), Cottle (1845), Macmullen (1860–62), Jeboult (1873), and Pring (1880).

Taunton, capital of Bristol county, Massachusetts, at the head of navigation on Taunton River, 34 miles by rail S. of Boston. It contains a fine park, court-house, city hall, state lunatic asylum, and numerous foundries and cotton-mills, locomotive and copper works, shipyards, and manufactories of bricks, nails, jewellery, &c. Taunton was settled from Taunton in England in 1637. Pop. 34,000.

Taunus Mountains. See Hesse-Nassau.

Taupo, Lake. See New Zealand.

Tau'rida, a government of South Russia, bounded E., S., and SW. by the Sea of Azov and the Black Sea. The Crimea forms its southern portion. Area, 24,539 sq. m.; pop. 2,000,000.

Taurus, Mount. See Asia Minor.

Tavastehus, a town of Finland, on Lake Vanajäjärvi, 50 miles N. of Helsingfors. Pop. 6098.

Tavira, a Portuguese seaport, 20 miles NE. of Faro. It has sulphur-baths. Pop. 12,000.

Tavistock, a pleasant market-town of Devon, 11 miles N. of Plymouth and 31 (by rail 40) SW. of Exeter, lies in a trough of the hills on the Tavy's left bank, with Dartmoor stretching away from it to the eastward. An old stannary town, till 1885 governed by a portreeve, it is the centre of what was a great mining district; and it sent two members to parliament till 1867, then one till 1885. Two gateways, a porch, and the refectory are the chief remains of its once magnificent Benedictine abbey, founded in 961. It was rebuilt between 1285 and 1458, was the seat of a very early printing-press, and at the dissolution in 1539 was conferred on the first Lord Russell, remaining still with the Duke of Bedford. Tavistock has a fine parish church (1318) with a west tower (106 feet) resting on arches, a guildhall (1848), corn-market (1839), covered markets (1863), statues of the seventh Duke of Bedford by Stephens (1864) and Drake by Boehm (1883, a very fine one presented by the ninth Duke), and the Kelly College (1877), founded by Admiral Kelly. Drake and William Browne were natives; Pym and William Lord Russell members; and the Right Hon. W. H. Smith was educated at the grammar-school. The population is 4400. See works by Kempe (1830), Rachel Evans (1846), Worth (1888), and Alford (1891).

Tavoy', the chief town of a district in Tenasserim, Burma, on the left bank of the Tavoy River, 30 miles from its mouth. Pop. 22,400.

Tavy, a Devon river, flowing 20 miles to the Tamar. See a work by Mrs Bray (new ed. 1879).

Taw, a Devon river, flowing 50 miles, past Barnstaple, to Bideford Bay.

Tay, a river of Scotland, draining nearly the whole of Perthshire, and pouring into the German Ocean a greater bulk of water than any other British river, rises on Benloy, on the Argyllshire border, at an altitude of 2980 feet. Thence it winds 118 miles ENE., SSE., and E.—for the last 25 miles as a tidal estuary, ½ mile to 3¼ miles broad, which separates Perth and Forfar shires from Fife. In the first 25 miles of its course it bears the names of Fillan and Dochart; it then traverses Loch Tay, and it afterwards passes Aberfeldy, Dunkeld, Stanley, Perth, Dundee, and Broughty-Ferry. Its principal affluents are the Tummel (58 miles long, and sometimes regarded as a northern head-stream), Isla, Almond, and Earn. The Tay, as it is the most beautiful of Scottish rivers, so it is unrivalled for its salmon-fisheries, whose rental in good years exceeds £20,000. Vessels of 100 tons can ascend as high as Perth, but even to Dundee the navigation of the firth is much impeded by shifting sandbanks. For the Tay Bridge, see DUNDEE.

LOCH TAY lies 355 feet above sea-level, extends 14½ miles NE. from Killin to Kenmore, is ½ to 1½ mile broad, 15 to 85 fathoms deep, and covers 6550 acres. It is a magnificent Highland lake, flanked on the north-west by Ben Lawers (4004 feet), and containing near its foot a wooded islet, with a fragment of an Augustinian priory, founded in 1122 by Alexander I., who here buried his queen, Sibylla. In Sept. 1842 Queen Victoria was rowed up Loch Tay, on which a steamer was launched in 1883, and a railway to which, at Killin, was opened in 1886. See the articles RANNOCH, EARN, PERTHSHIRE, &c., and J. Geddie's finely illustrated monograph on the Tay (1891).

Tayport, a watering-place and police-burgh of Fife, on the south side of the entrance of the Firth of Tay, opposite Broughty-Ferry, and 3½ miles E. by S. of Dundee. Pop. 3300.

Tcherkask, (1) a town of S. Russia, on the Don, 12 miles S. of Novotcherkask (q.v.). Pop. 15,000.—(2) A town of Russia, 190 miles SE. of Kieff, on the Dnieper. Pop. 40,000.

Tchernavo'da, a town of the Dobrudja, Roumania, 30 miles WNW. of Kustendje, with a railway bridge across the Danube (1895). Pop. 5000.

Tchernigoff, capital of a Russian government, 85 miles NE. of Kieff. Pop. 35,000.

Teb, EL, 50 miles SSE. of Suakin, was the scene, in 1884, of Osman Digna's defeat.

Teck, a principality named from a castle on 'the Teck,' a limestone peak in the Swabian Alb, 20 miles SE. of Stuttgart. Held by various families from the 11th c. on, it passed in 1498 to the Dukes of Würtemberg. In 1863 the king of Würtemberg conferred it on Duke Albert's son, whose daughter became queen-consort of Great Britain in 1910.

Teddington, a town of Middlesex, on the left bank of the Thames, 13½ miles (by water 18½) SW. of London. At Bushey House, close by, is the National Physical Laboratory. Pop. 18,000.

Tees, a river rising on Cross Fell, Cumberland, and flowing 70 miles eastward, mainly between Durham and Yorkshire, to the North Sea, 4 miles below Stockton. Works carried out since 1853 have made it navigable to that town for vessels of large burden.

Tegern-See (Tay'gern, g hard), a beautiful mountain lake, 3½ miles long, in the extreme south of Bavaria, 30 miles SE. of Munich.

Tegu'cigalpa, the capital of Honduras, on the Rio Grande, 3400 feet above the sea, with mountains rising round about. Pop. 23,000.

Tehâma. See ARABIA.

Teheran', or TEHRAN, capital of Persia, 70 miles S. of the Caspian Sea. It stands on a wide plain, with Mount Demavend (q.v.) to the N. The old wall and ditch (4 miles long) were levelled in 1868, and the space thus gained made into a circular boulevard. New fortifications, 10 miles in circumference, were completed in 1873. The town rapidly extended, especially on the north side, where many fine streets, gardens, and buildings soon made their appearance, among them the British Legation. The Shah's palace, reconstructed since 1866, occupies the Citadel, its large court-yards laid out with gardens and fountains. The Shah has five other palaces in the neighbourhood. The bazaars, some of them very handsome structures, are filled with every kind of merchandise. Lines of telegraph radiate in all directions; and in 1886 a railway was constructed to Shah Abdul Azim, a place of pilgrimage 6 miles S. Tramways were also laid down, and gas and electricity have been introduced. Pop. about 280,000, the Europeans having likewise increased from 30 to 1000. Near Teheran are the ruins of Rei, the Rhages of the Book of Tobit, and Ragæ of Alexander the Great's time, Harûn-al-Raschid's birthplace.

Tehuantepec (Te-wan-te-pek'), a town of Oaxaca, Mexico, 10 miles above the mouth of the river Tehuantepec; pop. 25,000. The isthmus here is only 120 miles wide, and an interoceanic canal has been dreamt of since Cortes' day. A railway across it was opened in 1894, rebuilt 1907.

Teifi, a river of South Wales, flowing 50 miles to Cardigan Bay.

Teignmouth (Tinmuth), a Devon seaport and watering-place, 12 miles (by rail 15) S. of Exeter, on the N. side of the Teign's pretty estuary, which is spanned by a wooden bridge (1827), 557 yards long. Burned by the Danes in 970, by the French in 1338 and 1690, it has a grassy promenade, the Din or Dune, a pier (1866), a public market (1883), baths (1883), a Benedictine nunnery (1865), &c. Pop. 9500.

Tekna, a region in the N. of Rio de Oro, from the Draa to Cape Bojador.

Tel-el-Amarna, or TELL-EL-AMÂRINA, a mass of ruins representing the capital of the heretic Egyptian king, Amenhotep IV., a little N. of Assiout, on the Nile's E. bank. Here, in 1887, were found 230 tablets in Babylonian cuneiform.

Tel-el-Kebir (Kebeer'), midway on the railway between Ismailia and Cairo, was the scene on the morning of 13th September 1882 of the capture by Sir Garnet Wolseley of Arabi Pasha's entrenched camp, defended by 26,000 men.

Tell, a district in NW. Africa, extending from the Mediterranean to the Atlas Mountains, through Morocco, Algeria, and Tunis.

Tellicher'ri, a seaport in Malabar district, Madras Presidency. Pop. 28,000.

Tembuland. See TRANSKEI.

Teme, a river of South Wales and Worcestershire, flowing 60 miles east-south-eastward to the Severn, 1½ mile S. of Worcester.

Temesvar (Tem-es-vahr'), a royal free city of Hungary, on the Bega Canal, 160 miles SE. of Pesth by rail. It has a fine cathedral, an ancient castle, and manufactures of flour, tobacco, cloth, silk, paper, leather, wool, and oil. Temesvar has endured many sieges—the latest in 1849, when it was bombarded for 107 days by the Hungarian insurgents, but relieved by Haynau. Pop. 75,000.

Tempe (Tem'pee), a famous mountain-gorge, 6 miles long, in NE. Thessaly, between Olympus and Ossa. The river Peneus traverses it.

Templemore, a town of Tipperary, on the Suir, 8 miles N. of Thurles, took its name from a Knights Templars' commandery. Pop. 1800.

Tenas'serim, the southernmost division of Burma, is a narrow territory between the sea and the mountains of the Siamese frontier. Area, 46,590 sq. m.; population now about 1,500,000. The chief towns are Maulmain, Taung-ngu, and Tavoy. The town of Tenasserim (pop. now under 600) stands 33 miles from the sea at the junction of the Great and Little Tenasserim rivers.

Ten'bury, a town of Worcestershire, on the Teme, 22 miles NW. of Worcester. It has a spa, discovered in 1839, and St Michael's College, founded in 1855 by Sir Gore Ouseley. Pop. 2000.

Tenby, a thriving watering-place of Pembrokeshire, South Wales, 9½ miles E. of Pembroke and 276 W. of London, is finely seated on a rocky headland overlooking Carmarthen Bay. The Cymric Din-bach y Pysgod ('fishy little fortress'), it was one of the Flemish colonies planted by Henry I. in Pembrokeshire, and retains a long stretch of its ancient walls, strengthened by Queen Elizabeth in 1588, and a fragment of a castle, whence in 1471 the future Henry VII. escaped to Brittany. Its mild climate, fine level sands, and capital bathing have been the making of the place, which has an interesting Gothic church (1250) with a spire 152 feet high, a colossal marble statue of the Prince Consort (1865), and a fort (1868) on St Catherine's Island. It is an ancient municipal borough, and with Pembroke (q.v.), &c., returns one member. The population is about 4400. See works by P. H. Gosse (1856) and Mrs Hall (2d ed. 1873).

Tène, La, near the north end of the Lake of Neuchâtel (q.v.), was the seat of a characteristic type of prehistoric culture.

Ten'edos (Bosdscha Ada), a rocky Turkish island in the Ægean, off the Troad, and 12 miles S. of the entrance to the Dardanelles. It is 8 miles long and 2 to 4 broad. Pop. 5000.

Teneriffe, Peak of (usu. Ten-er-iff'; Span. Tenerife, pron. Tay-nay-ree'fay), a famous dormant volcano, the highest summit (12,200 feet) in the Canary Islands (q.v.), stands in the south-west of the island of Teneriffe or Santa Cruz. Its lower slopes are covered with forests, or laid out in meadows; but the upper ridges are wild and barren. The Peak El Piton and its two inferior neighbours, the Montana Blanco and Chahorra (9880 feet), rise from a rugged circular plain of lava debris and pumice, 7000 feet above sea-level, about 8 miles in diameter, and fenced in by an almost perpendicular wall of rock. From the crevices sulphurous vapours exhale. The wall of the crater at the top is 300 feet in diameter, and 70 deep. The colour of the whole is white. There is an ice cave at an altitude of 11,000 feet. The Peak can be seen more than 100 miles off. In 1795 and 1798 there was volcanic activity here. See works by Piazzi Smyth (1858), Olivia M. Stone (new ed. 1889), and Strettell (1890).

Ten'nessee, one of the central southern states of the American Union, is surrounded by Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and separated by the Mississippi River from Arkansas and Missouri. Its mean length is 385 miles, its mean width 109 miles; area, 42,050 sq. m. East Tennessee extends from the Unaka and Smoky Mountains to the crest of the Cumberland Plateau, contains some of the great ridges of the Appalachians, and abounds in magnificent scenery. Between the eastern ridges and the plateau stretches a valley region 100 miles wide, sloping from N. to S. Along its western edge the plateau rises in a bold wall 100 to 200 feet high; and on the plateau are the ridges and peaks of the Cumberland Mountains. The southern end is divided into two arms by a deep gorge with perpendicular sides (800 to 1000 feet). Between the Tennessee River in its northern course and the Cumberland Mountains is Middle Tennessee, presenting a varied landscape of mountains, plains, hills, and valleys. Between the Tennessee and the Mississippi rivers lies the western division. From the ridge bounding the Tennessee valley on the west, slopes a rolling plain, terminating in a steep bluff, beyond which are the alluvial bottom lands of the Mississippi. The coal-measures occupy an area of 5100 sq. m., and the seams are of exceptional thickness. The deposits of iron ore are practically inexhaustible; copper and zinc are found, and the marbles are celebrated. Several famous mineral springs are the resorts of invalids. The soil is fertile, and the forests of hard-wood timber constitute a great natural source of wealth. The climate is generally mild. Herbage is often green throughout the year, and cattle graze during the winter months. The rainfall amounts to 54 inches. The drainage of the state is ultimately received by the Mississippi. The Cumberland River, which enters the state from Kentucky, flows about 150 miles through the northern central part and then re-enters Kentucky. The Tennessee (800 miles), the largest affluent of the Ohio, formed by the Clinch and the Holston, flows southward through the depression in East Tennessee into Alabama, and then back northward across the state towards the Ohio. Agriculture is the leading industry. The staple crops are corn, cotton, hemp, tobacco, and peanuts. Stock-raising is extensively carried on. The production of pig-iron has greatly increased, and factories for machinery, agricultural implements, &c., have become numerous. There are also many cotton, woollen, flour, and paper mills, besides tobacco-factories and potteries. The chief towns are Memphis, the largest city (131,000), Nashville, the capital (110,000), Knoxville (36,000), and Chattanooga (44,000). The first permanent settlement was made in 1756; territorial government was established in 1790; and in 1796 Tennessee became a state. It was the last state to secede in 1861, and the first to re-enter the Union in 1866. Pop. (1800) 105,602; (1850) 1,002,717; (1880) 1,542,359; (1900) 2,020,616; (1910) 2,184,789. See Histories by Ramsey (1860), Carpenter (1863), Phelan (1889), and Thruston's Antiquities of Tennessee (1890).

Tenos, or Tino, a Greek island of the Cyclades; area, 70 sq. m.; pop. 14,000. The capital, Tenos, is on the S. coast; pop. 3000.

Ten'terden, a municipal borough in the Weald of Kent, 13 miles SW. of Ashford and 7½ S. by E. of Headcorn station. The church has a noble Perpendicular tower, built in the 15th c., and associated by legend with the Goodwin Sands (q.v.). Pop. 3350.

Tepic, a town in the Mexican territory of Tepic, 30 miles E. by S. of San Blas. Pop. 18,000.

Teplitz (Tay'plitz), a watering-place of Bohemia, in a beautiful valley near the Erzgebirge, 20 miles NW. of Leitmeritz by rail. The baths, supplied from a dozen alkalo-saline springs, are taken very hot, and are good for gout, rheumatism, &c. One spring is used for drinking. Pop., with Schönau, 28,000. Some 7000 bathers come here yearly, besides many more mere visitors.

Terneuzen, a small Dutch port, in Zealand, on the S. bank of the Scheldt. Pop. 8750.

Terni (i as ee), a cathedral city of Central Italy, 70 miles NNE. of Rome by rail. About 2 miles off is the cataract of Velino, 500 feet high, celebrated in Childe Harold. Terni is the ancient Interamna Umbrica, perhaps the birthplace of Tacitus. Pop. 10,000.

Terracina (Terrachee′na), a coast-town of Italy, 60 miles SE. of Rome. Pop. 10,000.

Terra del Fuego. See Tierra del Fuego.

Terrano′va, a seaport on the south coast of Sicily, 60 miles W. of Syracuse. Pop. 25,000.

Terre Haute (now Ter′reh Hoat), capital of Vigo county, Indiana, on the river Wabash, 72 miles S. of Chicago. Pop. (1870) 16,103; (1910) 58,157.

Territet (Ter-ri-tay′), a village adjoining Montreux (q.v.).

Terror, Mount, an Antarctic volcano (extinct) in South Victoria Land, 30 miles SE. of Mount Erebus. Its height is 10,900 feet.

Terschelling (Ter-skel′ling), one of the chain of islands N. of Holland. Area, 45 sq. m.

Teschen (Tay′shen), a town of Austrian Silesia, 35 miles ESE. of Troppau. Pop. 23,000.

Tessin. See Ticino.

Tetbury, an old market-town of Gloucestershire, 5 miles NW. of Malmesbury; pop. 1750.

Tetuan′ (Arab. Tetawin), capital and port of Spanish Morocco, 4 miles from the sea, and 22 S. of Ceuta; pop. 25,000 (one-third Jews).

Teviot. See Roxburghshire.

Tewkesbury, a quaint old market-town of Gloucestershire, on the Avon at its confluence with the Severn, 9 miles NNW. of Cheltenham, 10 NNE. of Gloucester, and 15 S. by E. of Worcester. On the site of the cell of the hermit Theoc, from whom the place got its name, was founded in 715 a monastery, refounded in 1102 as a great Benedictine abbey. Its noble church, consecrated in 1123, measures 317 feet by 124 across the transepts, and remains essentially Norman, in spite of later additions. It was restored by Scott in 1875–79. Special features are the west front and the massive central tower, 132 feet high. Many of the Clares, Despencers, Beauchamps, and other lords of Tewkesbury are buried here, as also the murdered Prince Edward and (possibly) Clarence; and in 1890 a tablet was erected to Mrs Craik, the scene of whose John Halifax is laid in Tewkesbury. The place has also a town-hall (1788), a corn-exchange (1856), Telford's iron bridge over the Severn (1824), with a span of 176 feet, a free grammar-school, &c. The thick mustard Falstaff speaks of is a thing of the past, and the trade is chiefly agricultural. Within half a mile was fought (4th May 1471) the famous battle of Tewkesbury, in which the Yorkists under Edward IV. gained a crowning victory. Incorporated by Elizabeth in 1574, Tewkesbury returned two members from 1609 till 1867, and then one till 1885. The population is about 5300. See works by Dyde (1790), Bennett (1830), Petit (1848), and Blunt (2d ed. 1877).

Tex′as is the extreme south-western state of the American Union, bordering on Mexico, the states of New Mexico, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana, and the Gulf of Mexico. The largest state in the Union (265,780 sq. m.), it covers nearly 9 per cent. of the total area of the United States, exclusive of Alaska; and is larger than France or Germany, and more than twice as large as the British Isles. Its extreme length is about 900 miles, and its greatest breadth 750; the coast-line is 400 miles long. From the low, flat prairie lands along the coast the land rises till it reaches the plateau and mountains of the distant west, some of whose peaks attain 5000 feet. All along the coast is a fringe of low islands (Padre Island is 100 miles long) and peninsulas, separated from the mainland by lagoons. The alluvial coast-belt, extending from 25 to 60 miles inland, comprises both fertile lowlands and stretches of barren soil. Beyond lies a terrace of rich rolling land called the 'prairie belt.' In the eastern prairie sections there are extensive timber regions. N. and W. of the prairies the land presents a rough, broken surface, with occasional bluffs. On the southern border of the plateau the elevation is about 1000 feet, but a height of 2000 feet is reached as the ascent continues toward the arid Llano Estacado and the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains.

There is every variety of soil, from the fertile lands of the river-bottoms and prairies to the sterile sand of the southern desert. In the S. and SE. the rainfall is ample, in the W. and NW. insufficient. Yet even the Llano Estacado, or Staked Plains, once considered utterly uninhabitable, can supply water for irrigation by the use of artesian wells and windmills. The northern winds are usually dry, the rain comes almost entirely from the south-west, and the winter months are generally the driest. The best water-supply is found in the timber-lands. The climate on the coast-plains is semi-tropical, tempered by the winds from the Gulf. The north experiences cool winters, with heavy snowstorms at times. The air of western Texas is so dry that meats are perfectly preserved in the open air without salt. The 'norther,' a sudden and extreme change of temperature produced by a rush of cold wind from the north, ordinarily lasts for three days, and the fall in temperature is often as much as 30°. The Red and Arkansas rivers convey the waters of the northern part of the state to the Mississippi. The other streams flow directly into the Gulf. The Red and Sabine rivers and the Rio Grande form parts of the boundary line. Within the state the most important rivers are the Trinity, the Brazos, and the Colorado. The coal-measures occupy about 10,000 sq. m., besides extensive beds of brown lignite. There are vast deposits of iron ore, tin and other metals are found, and the supply of lime, gypsum, and salt is inexhaustible. Agriculture and stock-raising are the leading occupations. Rather more than one-half of the entire area is practically uninhabited, but settlements are extending. Texas ranks foremost in cattle-raising, thanks to its pasturage and climate. It is also a leading cotton state—for some years it was the foremost in produce. Wheat and the other grains are extensively cultivated. Sugar and rice yield abundant harvests along the coast, and fruits are produced in the south. Coal, petroleum, pig-iron, copper, and zinc are also exported. Austin, the capital, has a pop. of 30,000, and there are other seven cities whose populations are between 100,000 and 20,000 (San Antonio, Houston, Dallas, Galveston, Fort Worth, El Paso, and Waco). A hurricane and high tide in 1900 destroyed 4000 lives and $10,000,000 worth of property at Galveston. Texas formed part of the Spanish province of Mexico, which in 1822 became a republic. In 1835 it declared its independence, and in 1836 Houston was made president. In 1845 Texas, with a larger area than now, was annexed to the United States, this being the prime cause of the Mexican war. The state seceded from the Union in 1861, and re-entered it in 1870. Pop. (1870) 818,579; (1880) 1,591,749; (1910) 3,896,542 (690,000 coloured). See Histories by Yoakum (1856), Bancroft (1885), Raines (1896), Wooten (1898), and Garrison (1903).

Tex'el, an island of North Holland, at the entrance to the Zuider Zee. It is separated from the mainland by a narrow strait, called the Marsdiep. Area, 55 sq. m.; pop. 6500, who keep some 35,000 sheep, famous both for their wool and their cheese. The Marsdiep is also often called the Texel; and here many important naval battles have been fought. Blake defeated Tromp and De Ruyter in 1653; Prince Rupert fought De Ruyter in 1673; Duncan blockaded the Texel (for a time with a single ship) in 1797; and twelve Dutch ships of war and thirteen Indiamen surrendered to Admiral Mitchell in 1799.

Tezcu'co, a city of Mexico, on the east shore of the salt lake (92 sq. m.) of the same name, 25 miles by rail ENE. of Mexico city. The ancient Acolhuacan, once the chief seat of Aztec culture, it retains traces of palaces and of a noble aqueduct, and now has glass-works. Pop. 6000.

Thame (Tame), an Oxfordshire town on the river Thame, 13 miles E. by S. of Oxford. It has remains of an abbey (1138), and at it died John Hampden. Pop. 3000.

Thames (Temz), the most important river of Great Britain, flows ESE. across the S. portion of the country. Its four head-streams—the Thames or Isis, Churn, Coln, and Leach—rise on the south-east slope of the Cotswold Hills, the upper part of the main stream being often called Isis (a quasi-classical form of Ouse) and not Thames until after it receives the Thame near Dorchester. The Thames or Isis flows ENE. for about 35 miles, when, curving SE., it passes Oxford, and flows on to Reading. Here, after receiving the Kennet from the west, it again changes its course, and, winding eastward, passes Windsor, Eton, Teddington (the lowest of thirty-three locks between here and Oxford, and the highest point to which the tide ascends), Richmond, London, Greenwich, Woolwich, and Gravesend, below which it expands into a wide estuary, and enters the North Sea. On its tidal estuary, and on the fact that like most British rivers it has no delta, depends the river's importance as a navigable waterway; the navigation is, however, somewhat impeded by a 'submarine delta'—banks formed of river sediment. From Lechlade to the Nore the direct length is 120 miles, and with the windings may be 250 miles (112 from Oxford to London Bridge); the area of its basin is 6100 sq. m. Its chief affluents are the Windrush, Cherwell, Thame, Colne, Lea, and Roding, on the left; and the Kennet, Lodden, Darent, Mole, Wandle, and Medway, on the right bank. At London Bridge its width is about 290 yards; at Woolwich, 490; at Gravesend Pier, 800; 3 miles below Gravesend, 1290; and at its mouth, between Whitstable and Foulness Point, about 8 miles below the Nore, it is 18 miles across. At the Nore Light, reputed the mouth of the Thames, the breadth is nearly 6 miles. The river is navigable for barges to Lechlade, and it is connected with several important canals. Vessels of 800 tons can reach St Katharine's Docks; much larger ones can ascend to Blackwall, 6 miles below London Bridge; and the largest sea-going steamers reach Tilbury Docks, 26 miles below. The part of the river immediately below London Bridge is called the Pool; and the part between the Bridge and Blackwall is called the Port. Two embankments have been formed, one since 1864 on the north shore from Blackfriars Bridge to Lambeth Bridge, and one since 1866 on the south from Westminster Bridge to Vauxhall. The river supplies London with much of its drinking-water, and carries most of its sewage to the sea. Though the lower Thames has been converted into a sewer, in virtue of this same part of its course the river ranks as the chief commercial highway of the world. Above London the scenery is rich and beautiful, though not romantic, the numerous eyots or islands lending a peculiar charm. The Thames is the best beloved of English rivers for those who boat for pleasure. For boat-racing, it divides the honours with the Tyne; the Thames watermen are renowned in song and story. Since Spenser's days 'the silver-streaming Thames' has been sung by England's poets; Herrick calls it 'Silver-footed Thamesis;' Denham's apostrophe is famous; and Pope has word-painted much of the scenery of its banks. It was (now alas! long since) famous for its salmon, as it still is for other anglers' fish; below London flounders and eels are still plentiful, while the whitebait is almost peculiar to the lower Thames.

Thames (or GRAHAMSTOWN), New Zealand, a gold-mining town, on an inlet of Hauraki Gulf, 40 miles SE. of Auckland; pop. 3600.

Thamu'gas, 'the Numidian Pompeii,' near the Aures Mountains, and 22 miles from Batna, which is half-way by rail from Constantine to Biskra. Here are extensive remains of Roman colonnades and temples, with statues and inscriptions.

Thana, or NORTH KONKAN, a British district of India, consisting of the island of Salsette and a strip of coast. The seaport of Thana (pop. 16,000) is 21 miles NE. of Bombay by rail.

Than'et, ISLE OF, forms the NE. corner of Kent, from the mainland of which it is cut off on the W. by the river Stour and the Nethergong rivulet—the ancient Wantsome channel, completely silted up since the beginning of the 16th c. It is bounded N. and E. by the sea, and opens on the S. side into Pegwell Bay. It measures 9 miles E. and W., and 5 miles N. and S., and contains 26,880 acres. On its shores are the well-known watering-places Ramsgate, Margate, and Broadstairs; and on the North Foreland, in the NE., is a lighthouse, 85 feet high, visible 19 miles. Pop. (1871) 42,129; (1911) 71,631; (1911) 81,589. See Simson's Historic Thanet (1891).

Thann (Tann), a manufacturing town of Alsace-Lorraine, 13 miles NW. of Mülhausen, has a superb Gothic church. Pop. 7500.

Tharandt, in Saxony, 20 miles SW. of Dresden, has a forestry school and a pop. of 4000.

Tharsis. See RIO TINTO.

Tha'sos, the most northerly island in the Ægean, near the coast of Macedonia. Area, 167 sq. m.; pop. 12,000, almost all Greeks. The surface is covered with wooded hills (Hypsaria, 3428 feet). Its gold-mines were famous of old.

Thaxted, an Essex town, on the Chelmer, 6 miles N. of Dunmow. Samuel Purchas was a native. Pop. of parish, 1700.

Thayet-myo, a town of Lower Burma, on the Irawadi, 40 miles NW. of Prome. Pop. 20,000.

Thebes (Theebz), a celebrated Egyptian city, formerly capital of Upper Egypt; called by the Egyptians Tuabu, by the Hebrews No-Amon, by the Greeks Thebæ. It lies in the broadest section of the Nile valley, in 26° N. lat., at a spot where the desert on the W. sheers away to the Libyan mountains, leaving a broad plain, partly cultivated, on which stand the famous twin statues, one of which is known as the 'vocal Memnon,' and behind them the temples grouped about Kurna and Medînet-Habû. The Nile divides this western part or Necropolis of Thebes from the extensive ruins now known by the names of the villages Luxor (el-Uksur, 'the palaces') and Karnak which stand on the E. bank, with the low Arabian hills for a background. At the Persian conquest (525 B.C.) Cambyses got nearly £2,000,000 from the city, and destroyed many of its noblest monuments. The foundation of Alexandria still further injured it; and in Strabo's time Thebes was only a cluster of small villages. Its temples, tombs, and ruins were visited by many Greek and Roman travellers, including the Emperor Hadrian. A considerable Christian population lived there under the later empire; but at the Arab invasion the inhabitants fled to Esné. Thebes is now inhabited only by Fellahîn, a few officials, and visitors to the three hotels at Luxor. The Thebaid, the territory of Thebes, was a favourite retreat for Christian hermits.

Thebes, the principal city of Bœotia in ancient Greece, situated on the slopes of Mount Teumessus, and between two streams, the Dirce and the Ismenus, about 44 miles NW. of Athens. Destroyed by Alexander (336), Thebes was in 316 rebuilt by Cassander (whose walls were traced by E. Fabricius in 1888). It was plundered by Sulla, and in Strabo's time was a miserable village. During the 11th and 12th centuries it revived through its silk manufacture, but under the Turks again declined, though its modern representative, Thiva, destroyed by earthquake in April 1894, has a population of 4000 or 5000, and is connected by railway with Athens.

Theiss (Tice; Hun. Tisza), the chief river of Hungary, rises by two streams, the Black Theiss and the White Theiss, in the Carpathians, and winds 750 miles NW., SW., and S., joining the Danube after running parallel to it for 300 miles. The Theiss has several large and navigable affluents, as the Maros and Bodrog. The lower part of its course is sluggish, and it has often inundated the plains, flooding the cities on its banks, such as Szegedin (q.v.). Much has lately been done to regulate the course and drain the marshes on its banks.

Theobalds (Tib'alds), Hertfordshire, near Waltham Cross, 13 miles N. of London, a former mansion built by Lord Burghley, and exchanged for Hatfield in 1607 by his son the Earl of Salisbury with James I., who died here. It was demolished in 1650 and 1762. The present Theobalds Park, across the New River, is the 18th-c. seat of the Meux family. Here Temple Bar, removed in 1878–79, was re-erected in 1888.

Theodosia (see KAFFA), the town which superseded Sebastopol as a commercial port.

Theresio'pel. See SZABADKA.

Thermop'ylæ (lit., 'hot gates'), a pass leading from Thessaly into Locris, and the only road by which an invading army can penetrate from northern into southern Greece. In it are several hot springs, whence the name probably. It has won an eternal celebrity by the heroic death here of Leonidas and his 300 Spartans in their attempt to stem the tide of Persian invasion (480 B.C.).

Thessaloni'ca. See SALONICA.

Thes'saly, the largest division of ancient Greece, lay S. of Macedonia and E. of Epirus. In 1204 A.D. it came under the Venetians, and in 1355 was taken by the Turks. In 1881 Turkey ceded to Greece (q.v.), Thessaly S. of mountains forming the watershed of the Salambria (anc. Peneus), by much the largest and most fertile section, forming the three nomarchies of Larissa, Trikhala, and Phthiotis with Phocis. The remainder was recovered in the war of 1912–13.

Thetford, a market-town on the border of Norfolk and Suffolk, at the Thet's confluence with the Little Ouse, 31 miles SW. of Norwich and 12 N. of Bury St Edmunds. Doubtfully identified with the Roman Sitomagus, it was the capital of Saxon East Anglia, the seat from 1070 of a bishopric, transferred to Norwich in 1094 (since 1894 it again gives title to a suffragan bishop). It suffered much from the Danes between 870 and 1010; in Edward III.'s time it had eight monasteries and twenty churches (now only three). The steep Castle Hill, 100 feet high and 260 yards in circumference, is one of the largest earthworks in the kingdom; and there are remains of Bigod's Cluniac priory (1104). The grammar-school (1566) was rebuilt in 1879. The industries include brewing, tanning, and farming machinery; and there is some trade by barges on the Ouse. 'Honest' Tom Martin, the antiquary, and Tom Paine were natives. Incorporated in 1573, Thetford returned two members till 1867; it has a suffragan bishop under Norwich (1894). Pop. 4800. See works by Martin (1779) and Hunt (1870).

Thian-shan. See TIAN-SHAN.

Thibet. See TIBET.

Thielt (Teelt), a town of Belgium, 18 miles SE. of Bruges by rail. Pop. 10,800.

Thiers (Tee-air'), a manufacturing town in the French dep. of Puy-de-Dôme, on the Durole, 23 miles ENE. of Clermont by rail. Pop. 17,500.

Thionville (Tee-on^g-veel; Ger. Diedenhofen), a fortified town of Lorraine, 18 miles N. of Metz. Taken by Condé in 1643, it fell with Lorraine to France, but was besieged and taken by the Germans, 9th–25th November 1870. Pop. 15,000.

Thirlestane Castle. See LAUDER.

Thirlmere, a narrow sheet of water in the heart of the Lake District (q.v.), lying 533 feet above sea-level, between Derwentwater and Grasmere. It was acquired as a water-supply by Manchester (q.v.), and the work was carried out in 1885–94. Originally 2½ miles long and 328 acres in area, the embankment (294 yards long) raised the surface by 50 feet, and increased the length to 3⅔ miles, and the area to 793 acres.

Thirsk, a town in the North Riding of Yorkshire, in the Vale of Mowbray, on the Cod Beck, an affluent of the Swale, 23 miles NNW. of York. It has a fine church, and manufactures farm implements and saddlery. Thirsk returned two members till 1832, and then one till 1885. Pop. 3000. See W. Grainge, The Vale of Mowbray (1859).

Tholen (To'len), a Dutch island, part of Zeeland province, with a town of Tholen (pop. 3100).

Thomastown, a Kilkenny market-town, on the Nore, 19½ miles N. of Waterford; pop. 960.

Thomasville, a town of Georgia, 200 miles by rail WSW. of Savannah; pop. 6800.

Thompson, a town of Connecticut, 38 miles N. by E. of Norwich; pop. 7000.

Thongwa, a town of Burma, administrative capital of a district, 23 miles SW. of Rangoon. Pop. 20,000.

Thorn (Torn; Pol. Torun), a town of West Prussia, on the right bank of the Vistula (here spanned by a viaduct 1100 yards long), 31 miles by rail ESE. of Bromberg. Founded by the Teutonic Order in 1231, and a member of the Hanseatic League, it contains a town-hall and a number of other buildings with beautiful gables and interiors; became a Polish town in 1454; and was annexed to Prussia in 1793, and again finally in 1815. An important stronghold in the 17th c., it was five times besieged between 1629 and 1813; and since 1878 has been made a fortress of the first rank, the old fortifications being removed, and a series of detached forts built. Copernicus was a native; and a colossal bronze statue of him was erected in 1853. Pop. 46,500.

Thornaby-on-Tees, the name under which South Stockton (q.v.) was incorporated in 1892; pop. 20,000.

Thornbury, a Gloucestershire market-town, 12 miles N. of Bristol. Pop. of parish, 2600.

Thorne, a market-town of Yorkshire, on the Don, 10 miles NE. of Doncaster.

Thorney, a Cambridgeshire parish, 7 miles ENE. of Peterborough, was the seat of a monastery (662).

Thornhill, a town of Yorkshire absorbed by Dewsbury in 1910.

Thornhill, a Dumfriesshire village, on the Nith, 14 miles NNW. of Dumfries; pop. 1700.

Thornliebank, a town of Renfrewshire, 1½ mile SW. of Pollokshaws; pop. 3000.

Thorshavn. See FAROE ISLANDS.

Thornton, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, now incorporated with Bradford.

Thourout (Fr. pron. Too-roo), a Belgian town, 11 miles SW. of Bruges. Pop. 10,200.

Thousand Islands. See ST LAWRENCE.

Thrace, a name used by the ancients somewhat vaguely for a large region to the west of the Euxine (Black Sea), so as to include the whole country between the Ister (Danube) and the Ægean, and even part of the Scythian country beyond the Ister. The northern part of Thrace has become Bulgarian, as has also (1913) the south-western part. Turkey retains the south-east, including Adrianople.

Thrapston, a Northamptonshire town, on the Nen, 21 miles NE. of Northampton; pop. 1800.

Thrasimene. See TRASIMENE.

Threave Castle. See DEE.

Three Rivers (Trois Rivières), capital of St Maurice county, Quebec, at the confluence of the St Maurice and St Lawrence, 95 miles NE. of Montreal. It has a large trade in lumber; and manufactures boots, car-wheels, and stoves. Champlain founded it in 1634. Pop. 14,000.—THREE RIVERS, Michigan, on the St Joseph River, 128 miles E. of Chicago; pop. 7000.

Throndhjem. See TRONDHJEM.

Thule (Thyoo'lee). See SHETLAND.

Thun (Toone), a picturesque and ancient town of Switzerland, 17 miles SSE. of Bern by rail. It stands on the Aar, hardly a mile from the Lake of Thun (12 miles long, 2 broad; greatest depth, 1844 feet), out of which the crystal river rushes past the town. Pop. 6100.

Thunder Bay. See SUPERIOR (LAKE).

Thurgau (Toor-gow; Fr. Thurgovie), a frontier canton of NE. Switzerland. Area, 381 sq. m.; population, 135,000, of whom two-thirds are Protestants. The surface attains only 3722 feet; the chief river is the Thur, flowing WNW. to the Rhine in Zurich canton. Capital, Frauenfeld.

Thuringia (Ger. Thüringen—pron. nearly Tee'ring-en), the name still borne by that part of the ancient Saxon area bounded by the Werra, the Saale, and the Harz Mountains; the Thuringian states being the minor Saxon Duchies (q.v.), the two Schwarzburgs, the two Reuss principalities, and small parts of Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria. The Thuringian Forest (Thüringer Wald) is a series of wooded mountain-ridges (highest point, 3224 feet above sea-level) occupying great part of this area. It is some 70 miles long, and belongs to the Sudetic system.

Thurles (Thur'less), a town of Tipperary, on the Suir, 87 miles SW. of Dublin by rail. It has the classical R. C. cathedral (cost £45,000) of Cashel archbishopric; 4 miles off is the beautiful 14th-c. ruin of Holy Cross Abbey. Pop. 4600.

Thursday Island, one of the smallest of the group of the Torres Straits islands, north of Cape York, and belonging to Queensland. It has an excellent harbour, Port Kennedy.

Thurso, a police burgh and seaport of Caithness, at the mouth of the Thurso River, by rail (1874) 21 miles NW. of Wick and 154 NNE. of Inverness. It has a town-hall (1870), capital bathing, &c. The harbour had got silted up; but extensive improvements were carried out in 1891–92, when also a good pier at Scrabster was extended, on the west side of the bay. Paving-stones are prepared and exported. The self-taught geologist, Robert Dick (1811–66), was a baker here from 1830. Pop. 3330.

Thyati'ra. See AK-HISSAR.

Tian-shan (Tee-an-shan'; 'Celestial Mountains'), a great mountain-system in central Asia, extends from the Pamir (q.v.) to the north of the Tarim depression in Turkestan, and occupies the frontier region between Russian territory on the north and the Chinese dominions to the south. Khan Tengri (24,000 feet) is the highest point.

Tibbermore. See TIPPERMUIR.

Tibbu, a people of the Sahara (q.v.).

Tiber (Ital. Tevere, Lat. Tiberis), the chief river of Central Italy, and the most famous in the peninsula, rises in a dell of the Tuscan Apennines, 11 miles N. of the village of Pieve Santo Stefano, whence it winds 260 miles SSE., S., and SSW., and enters the Mediterranean by two branches, which enclose the Isola Sacra. Of these the northern, the Fiumicino, alone is navigable; the Fiumara is silted up. Towns on or near its banks are Perugia, Orvieto, Rome, and Ostia. It is navigable for boats of 50 tons to the confluence of the Nera, 100 miles from its mouth. The Tiber is supplied mainly by turbid mountain-torrents, whence its liability to sudden overflowings. Its waters, too, are still discoloured with yellow mud, as when Horace described it. See W. Davies, The Pilgrimage of the Tiber (2d ed. 1875).

Tiberias. See GALILEE.

Tibesti, or TU, a mountainous country in the Eastern Sahara (where 20° N. lat. and 16° E. long. cross), inhabited by a Tibbu tribe. The Tarso Mountains reach 7500 feet. First explored by Nachtigal in 1869, the country is since 1904 recognised as part of the French Sahara.

Tibet', or THIBET, a country in central Asia, called by the natives Bod or Bodyul, lying between China and India, and enclosed between the Kuen-Lun, Altyn Tagh, and Nanshan Mountains on the N., and the Himalayas on the S. Area, 700,000 sq. m., eight times the size of Great Britain. Tibet is the loftiest region of such extent on the globe; its tablelands, which vary in height from 17,000 to 10,000 feet, are loftiest in the west and north, whence they slope gradually to the south and east. Bonvalot certifies to the existence of volcanoes. The lowest lands in Tibet are the grooves in which the Indus runs westward and the Sanpo eastward to the points where they turn south through the Himalayas. The mountain-girdle which surrounds Tibet has kept it to the present day the country least known to geographers. Tibet is divided into provinces equal in extent to European states. Tsaidam, or Chaidam, in the NE., between the Nanshan and Altyn-tagh chains and the Kuen-Lun, includes the Koko-Nor lake. Katchi in the centre, just S. of the Kuen-Lun, contains the gold-fields of Thok-Jalung, one of the highest inhabited spots on the globe. East Nari, in the SW., includes Khorsum and Dokthol, an elevated Himalayan country in which the Indus and Sanpo take their rise, and contains Lake Manasarowar, 15,000 feet high, a sheet of water sacred alike to Tibetans and Hindus. West Nari, or Little Tibet, consists of Ladakh (q.v.) and Balti, now dependencies of Cashmere (q.v.) and the Indian Empire. Yu-tsang, the provinces of Yu and Tsang, occupying the valley of the Sanpo between the meridians of 87° and 92°, constitutes the most populous and important part of Tibet, and contains Lhassa, capital of Yu and of the whole country, and Shigatze, capital of Tsang. Kham, the province drained by the deep valley of the upper courses of the great rivers of China and Indo-China, is largely under the direct rule of China. The lake Tengri Nor, NW. of Lhassa, is 150 miles in circuit.

Tibet lies in the latitudes of Delhi, Cairo, Algiers, and Naples, but its inland position and elevation give it a cold, dry, and extreme climate. On the tablelands at an elevation of 14,000 feet the thermometer in May sinks to 7° F. below zero, and over the whole country an arctic winter prevails for five or six months. There is a very short but excessively hot summer, more especially in the valleys of the Indus and Sanpo. The northern and western tablelands are treeless, with steppes where innumerable herds of yaks, horses, asses, goats, antelopes, &c. pasture undisturbed by man. The southern tablelands supply food to the flocks and herds of a large nomad population. Agriculture is confined chiefly to the valleys of the Indus and Sanpo; and the irrigation and terrace cultivation necessary to secure even scanty crops are supposed to have sharpened the intelligence of the peasants and made them strong and laborious. The mineral products of Tibet include gold, silver, iron, copper, zinc, mercury, cobalt, borax, sulphur, &c. The Tibetans are good blacksmiths and cutlers; their chief industrial occupation, however, is the preparation of woollen cloth. They are active traders; and large caravans, in which yaks and sheep are the beasts of burden, are constantly traversing the country on their way to the great fairs in Tibet, and the entrepôts of the surrounding countries. At one time there was a busy commerce with India, but after Tibet became a Chinese dependency the passes were jealously closed. The pop. is estimated at 6,000,000.

The Tibetans are a Mongolic race, much more closely allied to the Burmese than to the Chinese or Mongols proper, and are broad-shouldered and muscular. A few nomads, Mongol and Turkish tribes, camp on the northern steppes, and Chinese in large numbers have colonised the south-east. Polyandry, the husbands of one wife being generally brothers, is almost universal among the poor Tibetans; the rich are polygynists. Both systems check population. In Little Tibet, where monogamy has penetrated from the west, population increases rapidly. There exist in Tibet two religions: the Bon or Bon-Pa creed, which is a development of Mongol Shamanism, and is the native religion; and Lamaism, a form of Buddhism introduced from India. The Tibetan clergy are very numerous; monasteries are everywhere. Since 1720 Tibet has been, nominally at least, a dependency of China. Civil and religious government was retained practically by the Tibetan clergy; the Dalai Lama delegating the active duties of government to the de-sri or king, with four ministers. The non-observance by the Tibetans of this Anglo-Chinese convention of 1890 (opening a trade 'port'), and their refusal to meet commissioners, led to the mission of 1904 under Sir F. G. Younghusband. The mission soon became an expedition, which, after sharp fighting at Gyangtse and elsewhere, forced its way to Lhassa, where, the Dalai Lama having fled, a treaty was concluded in the famous Po-ta-la palace-monastery. The Tesho Lama or Bogdo Lama (of Shigatze) superseded the Dalai Lama (of Lhassa) for a time; trade facilities with British India were increased (three new marts being established), and Tibet bound itself not to enter into relations with any foreign power save by British assent. A rising in 1912–13 resulted in the withdrawal of the Chinese officials and garrison. The Tibetan language is losing its monosyllabic character; its literature consists chiefly of translations from the Sanskrit, and of religious works.

Tibur. See Tivoli.

Tichborne, a Hampshire property, 6½ miles E. by N. of Winchester, from before the Conquest the seat of the Tichbornes.

Ticino (Ti-chee'no), a river of Switzerland and N. Italy, rises on the southern slopes of Mount St Gothard, and flows S. through Lake Maggiore, and then SSE. to its junction with the Po, 4 miles below Pavia.

Ticino (Ger. Tessin), the most southern canton of Switzerland, bounded W. and S. by Italy. Area, 1082 sq. m.; population, 160,000, mainly Italian-speaking and Catholics. The largest town is Lugano; since 1881 Bellinzona is the capital.

Tickhill, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 10 miles E. of Rotherham. Pop. 1800.

Ticondero'ga, a township of New York, 100 miles by rail N. of Albany, on Lake Champlain. Here the French built a fort in 1755, which figured largely in the war of independence.

Tideswell, a town of Derbyshire, 6½ miles E. of Buxton. Pop. 2000.

Tiel (Teel), a Dutch town, on the Waal, 60 miles E. by S. of Rotterdam. Pop. 10,800.

Tien-tsin (Teen-tsin), a city of China, on the Pei-ho's right bank, 34 miles from its mouth and 80 SE. from Peking, of which it is the port. The river is frozen over from December to March, when the business is taken up by sledges. By the treaty of Tien-tsin (1858) the port was declared open; a British consulate was established in 1861; and Tien-tsin is now connected by railway with Shanghai and Peking, and with the Pei-ho's mouth. Pop. 1,000,000.

Tierra del Fuego (Tee-er'ra del Foo-ay'go; 'Land of Fire,' so named by Magellan who saw fires on the shore, when he discovered them in 1520), a group of several large and many small islands named from the largest one, in 54° S. lat., 70° W. long., separated from the south end of South America by the Strait of Magellan. Its farthest south point is Cape Horn (q.v.). Staten Island and the half of the main island belong to Argentina; all the rest to Chili. The shores of the archipelago are much indented with bays and arms of the sea, with mountains rising abruptly from the water. The whole group is mountainous, attaining 7000 feet, and the snow-line being 4000 feet above sea-level. There are some dreary plains and a few fertile river-valleys, with areas of marshy ground. Towards the north the plains produce good pasturage. Forests of beech, winter's bark, magnolia, and cypress occupy large areas, with dense growths of bushes. Lichens cover much of both high and low grounds. The guanaco, tucu-tucu (a small rodent), dog, fox, and rat are the only native quadrupeds. Birds are abundant, including owls, falcons, and a great variety of sea-birds. The land of Tierra del Fuego is rapidly rising. The rocks are principally volcanic. Some poor coal and a little gold have been found. The climate is the most tempestuous in the world. The native inhabitants are of a low type, divided into three tribes, the Onas (or Aonas), the Yaghans, and the Alakalufs. They numbered about 10,000 in 1870, but are now reduced to about 1000. See Darwin's Voyage of a Naturalist (1845; new ed. 1889), surveys and voyages by King, Fitzroy, Cunningham, Fitzgerald, Conway (1902).

Tiffin, capital of Seneca county, Ohio, on the Sandusky River, 43 miles by rail SSE. of Toledo. It is the seat of Heidelberg College (Reformed Church; 1851), and manufactures farming implements, churns, stoves, woollens, &c. Pop. 13,000.

Tiflis (Tif-leess'), the chief city of a government and the capital of Russian Caucasia, on the Kûr, 165 miles as the crow flies ESE. of the Black Sea. Since 1883 it has been connected by rail with Batoum on the Euxine and Baku on the Caspian, and is the chief centre of trade between Russia and Persia. The old city, the capital of the Georgian princes by the 5th century, has been greatly metamorphosed since the Russian occupation in 1795 and annexation in 1802. In the middle ages the metal-workers of Tiflis were famous for their skill in engraving, inlaying, and brass-work; and the silversmiths and gunsmiths still maintain their character. Otherwise its manufactures (carpets, &c.) are unimportant. Near it are naphtha and thermal springs. Pop. 200,000.—Area of government, 15,800 sq. m.; pop. 1,250,000.

Tighnabruaich (Tee-na-broo'aihh), an Argyllshire watering-place, on the Kyles of Bute, 9½ miles NW. of Rothesay; pop. 750.

Tigré, the northern division of Abyssinia (q.v.).

Tigris (Heb. Hiddekel; Tigrâ in Old Persian, 'swift as an arrow'), a large river of Asiatic Turkey, rises south of Lake Goljik, in the mountains of Kurdistan, within a few miles of the eastern bend of the Euphrates, and flows 1150 miles SE., E., and SE. again, till at Kurna it joins the Euphrates (q.v.) 90 miles above its mouth in the Persian Gulf. It receives the Bitlis, Great and Little Zab, and Dyala, all from the left. In its upper course the Tigris is very swift, and it brings down much mud. On its banks are Diarbekir, Mosul, and Bagdad, with the ruins of Nineveh, Seleucia, and Ctesiphon. The river is navigable for small steamers to Bagdad.—For the Bocca Tigris, see Boca Tigre and Canton.

Tilburg, a town of Holland, 14 miles ESE. of Breda, is an important railway junction, and has 300 manufactories of calico, cloth, leather, &c. Pop. 53,000.

Til'bury Fort, in Essex, on the N. bank of the Thames, opposite Gravesend, and 22 miles E. of London. A block-house of Henry VIII.'s time, it was converted (1667) into a regular fortification after De Ruyter's expedition into the Medway, and has been greatly strengthened since 1861. Here on 8th August 1588, after the dispersal of the Spanish Armada, Elizabeth reviewed her troops. Extensive docks have been constructed at Tilbury since 1882. Pop. (urb. dist.) 6400.

Till, a Northumberland stream, flowing 32 miles to the Tweed, 2¾ miles NE. of Coldstream.

Tillicoul'try (oul as oo), a manufacturing town of Clackmannanshire, at the base of the Ochils and near the Devon's right bank, 10 miles ENE. of Stirling and 4 NNE. of Alloa. Woollens have been manufactured here since the 16th c., and later shawls and silks. Pop. 3100.

Tillietudlem. See Craignethan.

Til'sit, a town of East Prussia, on the left bank of the Memel or Niemen, 65 miles NE. of Königsberg by rail. Here was signed, on an island in the river, the treaty of 1807 between Russia and Napoleon. Pop. 40,000.

Tilt. See Glentilt.

Timaru (Timaroo'), a small port in the south island of New Zealand, 100 miles SW. of Christchurch by rail. Pop. 11,300.

Timbo, capital of Futa Jallon (q.v.), in the heart of the country.

Timbuctoo' (native Tumbutu, Arab. Tinbûkhtu), a famous city of the Soudan, on the southern edge of the Sahara (q.v.), 8 miles N. of the main stream of the Upper Niger. It is 3 miles in circumference. The houses are mainly one-storey mud-hovels, but one of the three chief mosques is an imposing building, dating from 1325. The place stands on a trade-route between the interior and the west and south; and its importance increased through the gradual extension of the influence of the French, who in 1894 occupied the city (see SENEGAMBIA). Gold-dust, salt, kola-nuts, ivory, gums, ostrich-feathers, dates, and tobacco are exchanged for Manchester goods, mirrors, knives, tea, coral, &c. The town stands on the borders of various tribes and kingdoms—Sonrhai, Berbers, Tuaregs, Fulahs, Mandingoes, &c.; and amongst its 20,000 inhabitants all these races are represented, with Arabs, Arabised Africans, and Jews. Founded in the 11th c., Timbuctoo first became known to Europeans in the 14th (Ibn Batuta was here about 1350); till the French occupation it had been visited by but six or seven Europeans. Timbuctoo has been besung by Tennyson and Thackeray.

Timor (Tee-mor'), the most important of the chain of islands which stretch eastward from Java, has a length of 300 miles, an area of 12,264 sq. m., and a pop. of 500,000. A chain of wooded mountains runs throughout its entire length; one peak, Allas, near the south coast, being 11,500 feet high. It is less volcanic than its smaller neighbours of the Sunda group. Magnetic iron, porphyry, gold, copper, and sulphur are found. The exports are maize, sandalwood, wax, tortoise-shell, and trepang. The smaller western portion belongs to the Dutch (capital Kupang); the eastern part is Portuguese (capital Deli); but native chiefs really govern the island.

Timor-Laut (Tee-mor'-Lowt), or TENIMBER, a group of three Dutch islands, E. of Timor, extending 100 miles, and 2263 sq. m. in area. Unlike Timor, they are mainly coralline and correspondingly low-lying, though one extinct volcano is 2000 feet high. Pop. 25,000.

Tinchebrai (Tan^{g}sh-bray'), a town (pop. 3500) in the NW. of the Norman dep. of Orne, where Henry I. of England defeated his brother Robert.

Ting-hai. See CHUSAN.

Tinnevel'li (originally Tiru-nel-véli), a town of S. India, 170 miles by rail SSW. of Trichinopoli, and 1½ mile from the river Tambraparni. It is connected with the military station of Pallamcotta, across the river; has a Sind temple, Hindu college, and cotton-factory; and is a great Protestant missionary centre. Pop. 40,500.

Tino. See TENOS.

Tintagel Head (Tintaj'el), a cliff 300 feet high on the western coast of Cornwall, 22 miles W. of Launceston, and but 6 miles from Camelford—the Camelot of Arthurian legend. Partly on the mainland and partly on the so-called island, almost cut off by a deep chasm, stand the imposing ruins of the castle where King Arthur held his court. The oldest part, the keep, is apparently of Norman construction.

Tintern Abbey, Monmouthshire, perhaps the loveliest ruin in England, on the Wye's right bank, 5 miles above Chepstow. The abbey was founded in 1131 for Cistercians, but its church dates from the end of the 13th c. The length of the building is 228 feet; the style a transition from Early English to Decorated; the window-tracery is especially fine. In Wordsworth's noble Lines composed above Tintern Abbey, the abbey itself is not mentioned. See works by Heath (1793), Cooper (1807), and Thomas (2d ed. 1845).

Tinto. See LANARKSHIRE.

Tippecanoe (Tip'pehkanoo'), a river of Indiana, which rises in the north, flows 200 miles WSW. and S., and empties into the Wabash 10 miles above Lafayette. In a battle near its mouth, in 1811, General Harrison defeated the Indians.

Tip'perah (Tipura), a district of the division of Chittagong (q.v.); Hill Tipperah being a small tributary state on its borders.

Tipperary, an inland county of Munster, touching Galway on the north and King's County, Queen's County, and Kilkenny on the east. Area, 1659 sq. m., or 1,061,731 acres, of which 843,837 are arable. The county lies mainly in the basin of the Suir (total length 85 miles); the Shannon touches the north-west border. The surface is generally level, but is diversified by the Galtees (3008 feet), Knockmeledown (2609), and Slievenaman on the S., Keeper Mountain on the W., and the Slievardagh Hills on the E. To the isolated Devil's Bit many popular legends attach. The soil of the plain is a rich calcareous loam, singularly fertile and productive, especially the Golden Vale, in which stands Tipperary town. Anthracite coal is worked; and copper, lead, zinc, slates, and pipe-clay also occur. The chief occupation is agriculture, especially dairy-farming. The county, which since 1885 returns four members, is divided into two ridings, North and South, each subdivided into six baronies. Pop. (1841) 435,553; (1911) 152,433—all but 8000 Catholics. Anciently Tipperary formed part of the two principalities of Ormond, or North Munster, and Desmond, or South Munster; after the English invasion it was formed into a county by King John in 1210. Eventually it came to be divided between two Anglo-Norman families, the Butlers holding Ormond, and the Geraldines part of Desmond. The antiquities are numerous, as well Celtic as Anglo-Norman. In the latter the city of Cashel (q.v.) is specially rich; Holy Cross is a noble monastic ruin; the castle of Cahir is a fine specimen of baronial architecture. There is a series of caves near the Cork border.

TIPPERARY, the county town, is 110 miles SW. of Dublin by rail, with a Catholic and a Protestant church, and a noted butter-market; pop. 6650. Under the 'Plan of Campaign,' a 'New Tipperary' was opened on 12th April 1890; but the scheme collapsed in the following year.

Tippermuir, 5 miles W. of Perth. Here Montrose routed the Covenanters, Sept. 1, 1644.

Tipton, a town of Staffordshire, 4½ miles SSE. of Wolverhampton. It has important iron manufactures. Pop. 32,000.

Tiptree Hall, Essex, 3½ miles E. of Witham, was (1841–80) the model farm of Mr Mechi.

Tiree. See TYREE.

Tirhut (u as oo), a division of Bihar, divided into the districts of Saran, Champaran, Darbhangah (q.v.), and Muzaffarpur (q.v.).

Tirlemont (Teerl-mon^g'; Flem. Thienen), a Belgian town, 30 miles ESE. of Brussels. It manufactures machinery, hosiery, flannel, leather, sugar, &c. Here the French, under Dumouriez, defeated the Austrians in 1793. Pop. 18,000.

Tir'nova, a town of Bulgaria, on the Jantra, 35 miles SSE. of Sistova, became in 1235 the seat of the Bulgarian patriarch, and has more than once been the capital. Pop. 13,000.

Tiryns (Tir'rins), an ancient city of Argolis, in the Peloponnesus, 3 miles from the head of the Argolic Gulf. Its Cyclopean walls and those of the neighbouring Mycenæ are the grandest in Greece. The citadel was built on an oval-shaped rock, 330 yards long by 112 at its widest, fringed by a wall, 30 to 40 feet thick, and about 50 feet high (from the outside base), of blocks, 10 by 3½ feet. An older palace was excavated in 1914.

Tisbury, a Wiltshire town, 12¾ miles W. of Salisbury. Pop. 1500.

Titicaca (Teeteekah'ka), Lake. See Peru.

Titusville, a city of Pennsylvania, on Oil Creek, 120 miles by rail SSW. of Buffalo. It has oil wells, sawmills, ironworks, &c. In June 1892 it suffered from a flood. Pop. 8500.

Tiumen (Tyoo'men), a town of W. Siberia, 90 miles SE. of Tobolsk, on a feeder of the Tobol. Connected by rail with Perm, it is on several important trade-routes; and large quantities of leather, carpets, soap, candles, and pottery are manufactured and exported. It has a technical school, a great January fair, and an exile forwarding prison. Pop. 35,000.

Tiv'erton, a municipal borough of Devonshire, 14½ miles N. by E. of Exeter, stands pleasantly on an eminence between the confluent Exe and Loman, and got the name Twy-ford-ton from two fords upon those two rivers. Little save the gateway remains of the castle of the Earls of Devon, built in 1106, and dismantled after its capture by Fairfax in 1645. St Peter's, a Perpendicular church of the 15th century, was mostly rebuilt in 1855; and other edifices are the town-hall (1864), late Venetian in style, with a tower 80 feet high, the market-house (1830), the infirmary (1852), the Greenway almshouses (1517), Waldron's almshouses (1579), and the grammar-school (1604), which was founded by Peter Blundell (1520–1601), and has an endowment of £1100 a year. Among its scholars have been Bishops Bull, Hayter, Conybeare, and Temple, A. Hayward, 'Jack' Russell, R. D. Blackmore, and his hero, John Ridd. New school buildings in the Tudor style were erected in 1880 at a cost of £20,000. Tiverton was a great seat of the woollen trade from 1353 till 1700 and afterwards, but lace-making is now its staple industry, the lace-factory, employing 1500 workpeople, having been established in 1816 by Mr John Heathcoat (1783–1861), inventor of the bobbin-net frame. Cosway, the painter, and Mrs Cowley, dramatist, were natives; whilst Lord Palmerston for thirty years (1835–65) represented Tiverton, which was chartered by James I., but lost its two members in 1885. The population is about 10,300. See works by M. Dunsford (1790), W. Harding (2 vols. 1844–47), and F. J. Smith (1893).

Tiv'oli (anc. Tibur), a town of Italy, 18 miles E. of Rome by rail and steam-tramway, on the slope of the Sabine hills and the river Teverone (anc. Anio, q.v.). Here works for the electric lighting of Rome were inaugurated in 1892. Tibur was the favourite summer-resort of the wealthy Romans. Above the falls of the Anio rises the so-called Sibyl's temple, in good preservation; the church of San Giorgio is an ancient temple; there are extensive remains of Hadrian's magnificent villa, the villa of Mæcenas, mausoleums, aqueducts, baths, &c. Near Tivoli is the famous Villa d'Este. Pop. 9370.

Tlaxcala (Tlaskah'la), the smallest state of Mexico. Area, 1506 sq. m.; population, 185,000. The capital, Tlaxcala, stands 7300 feet above the sea; pop. 2850.

Tlemcen (Tlem-sen'), a town of Algeria, 80 miles SW. of Oran. Pop. 40,000.

Toba'go, the most southerly of the Windward Islands belonging to Britain, lies 18½ miles NE. of Trinidad (of which it is a dependency), is 32 miles long by 7 broad, and has an area of 114 sq. m. It was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and named by him Assumption; the name Tobago probably arose from the free use of tobacco by the Carib natives. It was long contested between Dutch, Spaniards, and French, but came to Britain in 1763. The island is volcanic, mountainous (1800 feet), and picturesque. Scarborough, its chief town, is on the S. side, and at the base of a conical hill (425 feet), crowned by Fort King George, now without garrison. The exports are rum, molasses, coconuts, livestock, and of late rubber, cotton, and tobacco. Pop. 20,000.

Tobermo'ry. See Mull.

Tobolsk, a town of W. Siberia, at the Tobol's influx to the Irtish, nearly 2000 miles E. of St Petersburg; pop. 20,000.—Area of Tobolsk government, 539,700 sq. m.; pop. 1,900,000.

Tobo'so, El, a town (pop. 2000) in the Spanish district of La Mancha, 60 miles SE. of Toledo, the home of Don Quixote's peerless Dulcinea.

Tobruk, a port with a fine harbour on the coast of Barca, 80 miles from the Egyptian frontier; pop. 5000.

Tocantins', an important river of Brazil, rises in the state of Goyaz, flows 15 miles N., and finally widens into the Pará (q.v.), 138 miles from the Atlantic. Its affluent, the Araguay (1600 miles), bears along a greater volume of water than the Tocantins itself. Steamers ascend for 400 miles from the sea; above the rapids 400 miles more is navigable.

Toddington, a town of Bedfordshire, 5 miles N. of Dunstable. Pop. of parish, 2000.

Tod'morden, a market-town on the border of Yorkshire and Lancashire, prettily situated among hills on the Calder, 9 miles N. by E. of Rochdale, 18½ NNE. of Manchester, and 13 W. of Halifax. The classical town-hall was erected in 1875, and in front of it is a bronze statue by Foley of John Fielden, M.P. (1784–1849), the founder here of an enormous cotton-mill. Coal abounds in the vicinity. Pop. 25,500.

To'goland, since 1884 a German protectorate on the Slave Coast, east of the British Gold Coast, between 0° 30′ E. long. and 1° 41′ E., the boundary towards the interior being somewhat indefinite; area, 33,000 sq. m.; pop. 1,000,000. It is the most prosperous of Germany's African possessions. Togo, the largest native town (pop. 8000), is on Lake Togo; Lome is the capital and the chief port.

Tokat', a town of Sivas province, Asia Minor, 70 miles inland from the Black Sea. Pop. 30,000.

Tokay, the centre of a wine-growing district in Hungary, 130 miles NE. of Pesth. Pop. 5500.

Tokushima, the largest town of Shikoku, Japan, on the NE. coast. Pop. 65,300.

Tōkyō, or Tōkei ('Eastern Capital'), is the chief city of the Japanese empire. Until 1868, when the emperor removed his court thither from Kyōtō, it was known as Yedo (‘Estuary Gate’). Its position at the mouth of the rivers which drain the largest plain of Japan, fits it to be a national centre. The lower portion of the city, which is flat and intersected by canals, stretches between the two parks of Ueno (north) and Shiba (south), famous for their shrines. Midway rises the castle or palace (1889), a fine structure in Japanese style, furnished in European manner, and lit with electricity, within a double ring of high walls and broad moats. In spring-time the city is gay with plum and cherry blossoms. The immense enclosures formerly inhabited by the nobles and their retainers, are gradually disappearing, and handsome modern buildings in brick for the use of the various government departments are taking their place. Of the fifteen city divisions (ku) the northern, Hongo and Kanda, are mostly educational, and contain the buildings of the Imperial University, Law School, &c. The student population is astonishingly large. The seaward districts of Nihonbashi, Kyobashi, and Asakusa are industrial and commercial, while the government offices are located in Kojimachi ku. Yokohama is the port of entry (17 miles off); but a great harbour scheme to cost 37,000,000 yen was planned in 1911–12. The city is subject to disastrous fires; that of April 1892 burned 4000 houses in one morning. Tōkyō has three railway termini and a system of electric tramways. Almost every phase of modern civilisation is to be found within the vast area (some 30 sq. miles). Pop. (1874) 813,500; (1910) 2,200,000.

Toledo (Tolay'do), a famous city of Spain, capital of a province, and long the capital of the whole country, stands on the north bank of the Tagus, 40 miles SSW. of Madrid by rail. It is situated on a number of hills, 2400 feet above sea-level; and the climate, excessively hot in summer, is bitterly cold in winter. The Tagus, flowing between high and rocky banks, leaves only one approach on the N., which is defended by an inner and an outer wall, the former built by the Gothic king Wamba in the 7th c., the latter in 1109, and both remarkable for their towers and gates. Seen from afar the city is most imposing; within it is gloomy, silent, inert. In its midst rises the lofty, massive, five-aisled cathedral, built in 1227–1493 on the site of a former mosque. The interior, which is more impressive than the exterior, was plundered in 1621 and 1808, but retains some admirable stained glass, and the choir is a perfect museum of sculpture. It is 404 feet long and 204 wide; the tower is 329 feet high. The great square or Zocodover, thoroughly Moorish in character, is a fashionable promenade. The Alcazar or old palace, the fortress commanded by the Cid, rebuilt as a palace in Charles V.'s time, and subsequently, occupied the highest part of the city, but was burned down in 1887. There are manufactures of church ornaments and vestments, and confections. Toledan sword-blades, famous since old Roman times, are still made, but outside the city. Pop. 23,470. Toledo, the Toletum of the Romans, and the capital of the Goths, was held by the Moors from 714 to 1085, when it was annexed to the crown of Castile as capital. In its highest prosperity it had 200,000 inhabitants. It was the headquarters of the Inquisition. The university (1498) is long since extinct.—Area of province, 5586 sq. m.; pop. 400,000.

Toledo (To-le'do), capital of Lucas county, Ohio, on the Maumee River, 8 miles from the western extremity of Lake Erie (to which a channel 17 feet deep has been dredged), and 92 by rail W. of Cleveland. It has a fine harbour, is on the Miami and Erie Canal, and is connected with all parts of the country by thirteen railways. Besides an immense union depot, it has huge grain elevators, and does a great trade in flour, grain, lumber, live-stock, tobacco, &c. There are great wagon-works, foundries, manufactories of boilers, pumps, engines, farming implements, and furniture, and boat-yards and bridge-works. Toledo was settled in 1832, and incorporated in 1836. Pop. (1880) 50,137; (1900) 131,222; (1910) 168,497.

Tolenti'no (i as ee), an episcopal city of Central Italy, 10 miles SW. of Macerata. Pop. 4888.

Tolima (Tolee'ma), a volcano of the Andes of Colombia (18,314 feet), gives name to a province.

Tolo'sa, a town in the northern Spanish province of Guipuzcoa, 15 miles S. of the seaport of San Sebastian by rail. Pop. 7239.

Tolúca, a town of Mexico, capital of Mexico state, and 45 miles by rail WSW. of Mexico city, lies in a valley nearly 8800 feet above the sea. It has a fine cathedral. Pop. 32,000. Near the town is the extinct volcano, Nevado de Tolúca.

Tombigbee. See Alabama.

Tomintoul' (ou as ow), a Banffshire village, near the Avon, 1100 feet above sea-level, and 14½ miles S. of Ballindalloch station. Pop. 500.

Tomnahu'rich. See Inverness.

Tomsk, a town of western Siberia, on the Tom, a tributary of the Obi, 2809 miles E. of St Petersburg, and on the great trading highway of Siberia, has a university (1888) and a ‘House of Science’ or people's university (1912); pop. 105,000.—The government has an area of 333,300 sq. m.; pop. 3,200,000.

Tonawanda, a town of New York, on the Niagara River and Erie Canal, 8 miles N. of Buffalo by rail; pop. 8500.

Tonbridge. See Tunbridge.

Tong, a Shropshire parish, 3 miles E. of Shifnal, with a collegiate church (1410), which figures in The Old Curiosity Shop. See a work by G. Griffiths (1894).

Tong'a. See Friendly Islands.—Tonga Bay is a small inlet of East Africa, bounded N. by Cape Delgado. Tongaland, or Amatongaland, is now a part of Zululand next to the Portuguese frontier, and with Zululand is included in Natal; area, 5300 sq. m.; pop. 100,000.

Tongarri'ro (i as ee). See New Zealand.

Tongking. See Tonquin.

Tongres (Ton^{g}r), an episcopal city of Belgium, Limburg, 12 miles NW. of Liége. There is a mineral spring in the vicinity, mentioned by Pliny. Pop. 10,000.

Tonk, a native state of Rajputana (area, 1415 sq. m.; pop. 301,000), named from its capital, 60 miles south of Jeypore; pop. 40,000.

Tonquin, or Tonkin, since 1884 a French possession, is the north-east portion of the Indo-Chinese peninsula, bordering on China. The country is naturally a province of Annam (q.v.), which, however, is nominally a protected kingdom, whereas Tonquin is simply a French colony. The main feature is the Song-coi, or Red River (variously spelt Song-koi, Sang-koi, &c.), coming from Yunnan, and traversing the whole of Tonquin lengthwise. The area is 46,400 sq. m.; the pop. is estimated at 6,000,000. The capital is Hanoi (q.v.). The chief products are rice, silk, sugar, pepper, oil, cotton, tobacco, and fruits, with some copper and iron; and companies are now working coal and antimony mines near the chief port of Haiphong. The imports have a value of about £1,200,000 (one-third only from France), the exports of £600,000 (only a small fraction to France). See works by C. R. Norman (1884) and J. G. Scott (1885).

Tönsberg, an old Norwegian seaport, 71 miles SW. of Christiania by rail. Pop. 8650.

Toombudra (correctly, TUNGABHADRA) rises in the south-west of Mysore, and flows 400 miles NE. to the Kistnah, 16 miles below Karnul.

Tooting, a district of Wandsworth borough.

Toowoomba, a town of Queensland, on the Darling Downs, 70 miles W. of Brisbane; pop. 20,000.

Tope'ka, the capital of Kansas, on the Kansas River, 67 miles W. of Kansas City. It is well built, with wide, shady streets, and possesses a handsome capitol, a Congregational college, a R. C. seminary, an asylum, &c. It is the see of an Anglican bishop. Founded in 1854, it became the state capital in 1861, and has now busy miscellaneous manufactures and industries. Pop. (1880) 15,452; (1910) 43,684.

Tophané (Top-hah'neh). See CONSTANTINOPLE.

Töplitz. See TEPLITZ.

Topsham, a Devon market-town, on the Exe, 4 miles SSE. of Exeter. Pop. of parish, 3000.

Tor Bay. See TORQUAY.

Torgau (au as ow), a town of Prussia, and a fortress of the second rank, stands on the Elbe's left bank, 70 miles SSW. of Berlin by rail. The castle, now barracks, contains a church consecrated by Luther in 1544; the town-church has pictures by Cranach and the grave of Luther's wife. Here in 1760 Frederick the Great defeated the Austrians. Pop. 13,000.

Tornea, a town in the Finnish government of Uleåborg, at the mouth of the Tornea River, which, rising in the Tornea lake, forms during great part of its course of 250 miles the boundary between Sweden and Finland. Pop. 1400; across the river is the Swedish town of Haparanda.

Toro, a town of Spain, on the right bank of the Douro, 20 miles E. of Zamora by rail. Pop. 8764.

Torontál, the Hungarian county on the Maros and Theiss, with Becskerek (q.v.) for capital.

Toron'to, the second city of Canada, lies on the N. shore of Lake Ontario, between the Don and the Humber, 310 miles WSW. of Montreal. As the latter is the metropolis of the east, so Toronto aims to be the metropolis of the west, including the newly-opened regions of the North-west. In 1749 the French established Fort Rouillé on the W. side of the present city, which in 1756 was destroyed to prevent its falling into the hands of the English. In 1793 Governor Simcoe finding Niagara or Newark too close to the American side—indeed, right under the guns of an American fort—for the seat of government, crossed Lake Ontario and established his headquarters in a tent here. In 1812 Toronto, called York by Governor Simcoe, was twice captured and burned by the American army and navy. In 1834 it was incorporated as the city of Toronto (Huron, 'place of meeting'). In 1837 it was the scene of a brief and ineffectual rebellion under Lyon Mackenzie. Pop. (1861) 44,821; (1871) 56,092; (1881) 86,415; (1901) 208,040; (1911, with extended bounds) 376,538. The city is the capital of the province of Ontario. Its chief churches are the cathedral of St James (Anglican), the Metropolitan Methodist Church, and St Michael's Cathedral (Catholic). The university of Toronto, which was burned to the ground in 1890, but rebuilt, is a very imposing structure, worthy of its noble site and splendid grounds. Federated with it are Victoria University, Trinity College (Anglican), Wycliff College (Protestant), Knox College (Presbyterian), and St Michael's College (Catholic); the teaching staff numbers about 150, and the students 1720. There are also the Normal School, the Collegiate Institute, a School of Practical Science, &c. Toronto has a Public Library (1884), the University Library, the Law Library, the library of the Canadian Institute, and the Legislature Library. It is known as 'the Queen City' or 'the City of Homes.' The lake commerce is very large in lumber, fruit, grain, coal, and cattle. Manufactures are important and varied.

Torphichen (Tor-phihh'en), a Linlithgowshire parish, 2½ miles N. of Bathgate, was the chief Scottish seat of the Knights of St John of Jerusalem.

Torquay (Tor-kee'), a watering-place of South Devon, occupying a cove on the north side of Tor Bay, 23 miles S. of Exeter and 220 WSW. of London. Tor Abbey was founded here for Premonstratensian monks in 1196; in Tor Bay in 1688 William of Orange landed at Brixham (q.v.), and during the war with France it was a frequent naval rendezvous. But till the beginning of the 19th c. Torquay itself was little more than an assemblage of fishermen's huts. About that time the advantages of its climate—sheltered position, equable temperature (mean 44° in winter, 55° in summer), and freedom from fogs—caused it to be resorted to by consumptive patients, and it soon acquired a European celebrity. The romantic hills and valleys of Torquay and its environs have been overspread with terraces, villas, and gardens, the luxuriance of its foliage being a delightful feature of this 'queen of English watering-places.' The scenery is as varied as it is beautiful, the geology of the district most interesting; and Kent's Cavern (q.v.) is only a mile distant. The remains of the abbey include some crypts and the 13th-century 'Spanish barn' (it housed some survivors from the Armada); and St Michael's Chapel, on a hill-top, is thought to have been connected with the abbey. St John's Church, by Street, is a striking edifice; and other buildings are the town-hall (1852), museum (1875), and theatre (1880). Torquay was incorporated as a municipal borough in 1892. It is a great yachting station; its chief industries are the working up of Devonshire marbles and the manufacture of terra-cotta. Pop. (1851) 7903; (1901) 33,625; (1911) 38,771. See J. T. White's History of Torquay (1878).

Torre dell' Annunziata (Torr-reh del Annoon'-tseeah'ta), a town of Italy, on the S. base of Vesuvius, 13 miles SE. of Naples by rail; pop. 30,000. —TORRE DEL GRECO, also at the base of Vesuvius, only 7 miles from Naples by rail, has been repeatedly destroyed by eruptions; pop. 36,000.

Torrens, LAKE, sometimes a brackish lake (130 by 20 miles), at others merely a vast salt-marsh, in South Australia, 90 miles N. of Spencer's Gulf. It is named after Sir R. R. Torrens (1814–84).

Torre Pellice (Torreh Pellee'chay; Fr. La Tour), a Piedmontese village (pop. 2840), 34 miles SW. of Turin by rail. It is the headquarters of the Waldenses.

Tor'res Strait, between Queensland and New Guinea, is 80 to 90 miles in width; its navigation is rendered dangerous by innumerable shoals, reefs, and islands. It was discovered in 1606 by Torres, a Spanish navigator.

Torres-Vedras (Tor'rez-Vay'dras), a Portuguese town, 26 miles N. of Lisbon by rail. Within its famous 'lines' Wellington defended himself the winter of 1810–11 against Masséna. Pop. 7000.

Torridge, a Devon stream, flowing 37 miles to the Taw at Bideford Bay.

Torrington, GREAT, a market-town of North Devon, on an eminence sloping to the Torridge, 10 miles (by rail 14) SSW. of Barnstaple. A castle (1340) has disappeared; and the church, of which Wolsey and John Howe were incumbents, was rebuilt in 1651, its predecessor having been accidentally blown up with 200 prisoners, after Hopton's defeat here by Fairfax, February 16, 1646. Torrington was made a municipal borough by Queen Mary. Gloves are manufactured. Pop. 3000.

Torry, a Kincardineshire fishing-village, at the mouth of the Dee, opposite Aberdeen.

Torshok, a town of Russia, 310 miles SE. of St Petersburg by rail. Pop. 14,574.

Tor'tola. See VIRGIN ISLANDS.

Torto'na, a town of Northern Italy, on a feeder of the Po, 13 miles E. of Alessandria; pop. 12,000.

Torto'sa, an old Spanish town, on the Ebro, 40 miles SW. of Tarragona by rail; pop. 28,000.

Tortu'gas (u as oo; Span. 'turtles'), ten low keys or islets of Florida, at the Gulf of Mexico's entrance, 120 miles WSW. of Cape Sable.

Tory Island, a small island, 2½ miles long, 9 miles off the north-west coast of Donegal, with a lighthouse, and a signal station (1890) connected by telegraph with Londonderry.

Tot'nes, a municipal borough of Devon, pleasantly situated on the slope of a steep hill on the Dart's right bank, 29 miles SSW. of Exeter and 24 ENE. of Plymouth. The Dart is navigable for vessels of 200 tons, and Brut the Trojan is fabled to have landed here: the 'Brutus Stone,' on which he first set foot, may be seen in the main street. At least, Totnes is a place of great antiquity, and retains two gateways, remains of the walls, a quaint guildhall, a good many antique houses, and a church (1432), with a noble red sandstone tower and a fine stone screen. The Norman castle of Judhael de Totnes, that crowns the hill-top, is represented by the circular shell-keep. There is a grammar-school (1568); and on the 'Plains,' near the river, stands a granite obelisk to the Australian explorer Wills, who was a native, as also was the Hebraist Kennicott. Incorporated by King John, Totnes returned two members till 1867. The population is only a little over 4000. See works by Colton (1850) and Worthy (2 vols. Exeter, 1889).

Tottenham, a northern suburb of London.

Toul (Toole), a town in the French dep. of Meurthe-et-Moselle, on the Moselle, 20 miles W. of Nancy. It has a former cathedral (965–1496), whose W. front, with towers 245 feet high, is one of the finest in France, an 18th-century hôtel-de-ville, and manufactures of lace, hats, &c. The Tullum Leucorum of the Romans, Toul maintained a semi-independence till 1545; on 23d September 1870 surrendered to the Germans after bombardment; and since has been strongly fortified with a cordon of forts. Population, about 10,000.

Toulon (Toolon^{g}'), a seaport and naval arsenal of France, in the dep. of Var, on the Mediterranean, 42 miles ESE. of Marseilles and 564 SSE. of Paris. It lies at the head of a deep double bay, and rises towards the north in the form of an amphitheatre. The port is divided into the old and the new—the former, on the east, appropriated to merchant shipping, and the latter, on the west, surrounded by the dockyard, slips, arsenal, cannon-foundry, &c. The dockyard covers 240 acres; and belonging to the arsenal are the sail-yard, armoury, museum, &c. The fortifications were greatly extended after the conquest of Algeria (1830); and again since 1880. A cathedral, founded in 1096, the hôtel-de-ville, and a large theatre are the chief buildings. The climate is dry and bracing, but the older portions of the town are still unsanitary, and were ravaged by cholera in 1884. Pop. (1872) 69,808; (1911) 104,582. The Greek Telonion and Roman Telo Martius, Toulon suffered much from the Saracens, and first rose into importance as a naval stronghold about 1600. The English were defeated off here by the united fleets of France and Spain in 1744; and in 1793 Toulon was occupied for four months by the English (under Hood) and the Spaniards, who, however, were forced to evacuate the place after a siege that is memorable as Napoleon's first great achievement. See Lambert's Histoire de Toulon (1886 et seq.).

Toulouse (Toolooz'), a southern French city, anciently capital of Languedoc, and now of the dep. Haute-Garonne, 160 miles SE. of Bordeaux and 466 S. by W. of Paris. With the Canal du Midi on the E. and N., it lies on the right bank of the Garonne, which is crossed here by a beautiful bridge (1543–1626), nearly 300 yards long, leading to the suburb of St Cyprien. The city has few fine public buildings—the archiepiscopal cathedral, containing the tombs of the Counts of Toulouse; the Capitole, or town-hall (1769); the church of St Sernin (11th to 15th c.); and the Musée, with interesting antiquities. Toulouse has a university academy, an academy of 'floral games,' claiming to date from a troubadours' contest in 1323, academies of arts, sciences, &c., schools of law, medicine, and artillery, an observatory, botanic garden, and a public library of 60,000 volumes. The place manufactures woollens, silks, leather, cannon, steam-engines, tobacco, brandy, &c., and carries on a great trade with Spain. Its liver and truffle pies are celebrated. Pop. (1872) 114,025; (1911) 149,576. The Tolosa of the Romans, Toulouse in 412 A.D. became the Visigoths' capital. After Charlemagne's time it was under counts, who made themselves independent about 920, but in 1271 it was reunited to the crown of France. Its literary celebrity reaches back to the Roman empire; early in the middle ages it became a seat of Provençal poetry, but it suffered terribly in Simon de Montfort's pitiless crusade against the Albigenses. On 10th April 1814 the French were here defeated by Wellington. Cujacius was born, and Fermat died, at Toulouse. The floods of 1855 and 1875 were specially disastrous.

Toung-ngu (ng as in ringing), a town of Burma, 170 miles NE. of Rangoon by rail. Pop. 20,000.

Touraine (Toorayn'), an old French province, whose capital was Tours (q.v.), and which coincided with the dep. Indre-et-Loire and part of Vienne. See T. A. Cook's Old Touraine (1892).

Tourcoing (Toorkwan^{g}'), a frontier town of France, dep. Nord, 10 miles NE. of Lille. It manufactures cotton, wool, linen, and silk goods, beet-sugar, &c. Pop. 83,000.

Tournay (ou as oo; Flemish Doornik), a Belgian town, on the Scheldt, 35 miles WSW. of Brussels. Its splendid Romanesque cathedral, 400 feet long, has five towers and pictures by Rubens; and there are also the churches of St Quentin and St Brice (with the grave of King Childeric), the belfry (1190), and a bronze statue (1863) of the Princess d'Epinoy, who in 1581 valiantly defended Tournay against Parma. An ancient place, but modern in aspect, Tournay manufactures hosiery, linen, Brussels carpets, and porcelain. Pop. (1880) 32,566; (1910) 37,976. Tournay (anc. Tornacum or Turris Nerviorum) was in the 5th c. the seat of the Merovingian kings. In 1526 it was included in the Spanish Netherlands.

Tours (Toore), capital of the dep. Indre-et-Loire, as it formerly was of the province of Touraine, stands in the fertile valley of the Loire just above the Cher's influx, 147 miles SW. of Paris by rail. It is a regularly built and handsome town, nearly divided in half by the Rue Nationale. The noble cathedral (13th to 15th c.) has very fine glass and two towers 205 feet high. Other buildings are the church of St Julien, the towers and other remains of the famous abbey church of St Martin (destroyed at the Revolution), the archbishop's palace, palais de justice, museum, public library, &c., besides fine statues of Descartes and Rabelais. Near the town are the remains of the monastery of Marmoutier, and of the castle of Plessis les Tours, the favourite residence of Louis XI. There are some well-preserved ancient houses, including that of the executioner Tristan l'Hermite; and round Tours are many of the fine old chateaux for which Touraine is famous. Tours has a brisk trade, manufactures woollens and silk, does much printing, &c., and is famous for its plums and confections. Pop. (1872) 43,368; (1911) 73,398. The Roman Cæsarodunum, Tours was the capital of the Turones (whence the modern name). Near it Charles Martel won the great victory that saved northern Europe from the Saracens (732). During the Franco-German war Tours was the seat of government from 11th Sept. to 10th Dec. 1870. SS. Martin and Gregory both were bishops of Tours.

Towcester, a town, on the Tove, 8¼ miles SSW. of Northampton. Pop. of parish, 2400.

Tower Hamlets, originally certain parishes, hamlets, and liberties without the City of London, and within the jurisdiction of the lieutenant of the Tower; now a parliamentary borough, lying E. of the City and Finsbury. Till 1885 it sent two members to parliament; since then seven for its seven divisions—Whitechapel, St George's-in-the-East, Limehouse, Mile-End, Stepney, Bow and Bromley, and Poplar. Pop. (1911) 442,430.

Townsend, Mount. See Australia, p. 62.

Townsville, an important port of Queensland, in Cleveland Bay (lat. 19° 10′ S.), with foundries, breweries, &c. Pop. 13,400.

Towton. See Tadcaster.

Towy, a river of South Wales, flowing 64 miles to Carmarthen Bay.

Toyama, a town near the west coast of the main island of Japan. Pop. (1910) 57,500.

Tra′cadie, a Canadian fishing-town on the E. coast of New Brunswick, 35 miles E. of Bathurst, with a leper hospital.

Trafalgar, Cape (usu. Trafal′gar; prop. Trafalgar′), a low Spanish promontory, 29 miles WNW. of Tarifa (q.v.) on the Strait of Gibraltar. Off it, on 21st October 1805, Nelson defeated the combined fleets of France and Spain. See Professor Laughton's Story of Trafalgar (1890).

Trafford, a Manchester suburb at the end of the Ship Canal.

Tralee′, a town of Kerry, on the Lee, a mile above its mouth in Tralee Bay, and 207 miles SW. of Dublin by rail. There is a ship-canal to the sea, but the trade has decayed since larger ships took to discharging at Fenit, 5 miles off. Tralee returned a member till 1885. Pop. 10,300.

Tramore, a watering-place, 7 miles S. of Waterford. Pop. 1600.

Tranent′, a police-burgh of Haddingtonshire, 10 miles east of Edinburgh. It has a fine school (1877), water-works (1883), and in the church Colonel Gardiner's grave. Coal has been mined here since 1219. Population, 4600. See P. M‘Neil's Tranent (2d ed. 1884).

Trani (Trah′nee), a seaport of southern Italy, 28 miles NW. of Bari by rail, with a 12th-century archiepiscopal cathedral. Pop. 30,000.

Tranquebar′, a Madras seaport, 22 miles N. of Negapatam. Danish 1624–1807, it passed to Britain in 1845 for £20,000. The first Protestant mission was established here in 1706. Pop. 6189.

Transbaikalia. See Siberia and Baikal.

Transcaspia, the Russian territories E. of the Caspian. The Transcaspian Railway runs to Merv, Samarcand, Bokhara, Khokand, and Andijan.

Transcaucasia. See Caucasus.

Transkei Territory (Trans-kī) is a part of the Cape Province, lying between the Great Kei River (the boundary of British Kaffraria) and Natal. Covering most of the former Kaffraria, it is now divided into Griqualand East, Tembuland, and Transkei Proper (Fingoland, Idutwya, and Galekaland). Pondoland is separately administered.

Transleithania. See Austria.

Transvaal (long an independent state, and from 1884 till 1900 officially called the 'South African Republic'), now part of the Union of South Africa, in the south-eastern highlands, is bounded on the N. by Rhodesia, on the E. by Portuguese East Africa and Swaziland, SE. by Natal, S. by the Orange Free State, and W. by Bechuanaland. Its length from the Vaal River on the S. to the Limpopo River on the N. is over 400 miles, while a line between the extreme southern and eastern points (25° to 32° E. long.) reaches 700 miles. Prior to 1830 the land was inhabited by several Bantu tribes under the Zulu chief Umziligase, and was noted for its abundance of game. In 1835 some Cape Colony 'boers' or farmers of Dutch descent, offended by official regulations, 'trekked' into what is now Natal. On its being annexed by Britain in 1856, they trekked into this wild region, and till 1870 received accessions from the south. After much bloodshed the natives were mostly subdued or driven out. The Boers were pioneers and pastoral farmers, who tilled but little of the soil, and had none of the trader's instinct. The little commerce was in British hands. In 1877, owing to an exhausted public treasury and accumulated debts brought about by chronic native wars, the republic was on the eve of dissolution, and the British government assumed the care of it, subjugated the rebellious natives, and put the finances in order. But promises made to the Boers as to self-governing institutions were not carried out; friction was created; and there followed the Transvaal war, the death of General Colley (see Majuba), and the conventions of 1880 and 1884 between England and the Transvaal. The first gave the Boers republican rights, but retained British control over boundaries, native affairs, and foreign relations; the 1884 convention modified the restrictions considerably. British 'suzerainty' was still recognised, and a diplomatic agent represented Britain at Pretoria. The rapid development of the gold industry greatly increased the financial prosperity, but introduced elements of difficulty into public life. The growing number of 'Uitlanders,' who brought prosperity to the republic, resented their exclusion from political privileges; and their discontent led first to the disastrous 'Jameson Raid' in 1895, and to the war of 1899–1902, in which the Orange Free State sided with the Transvaal. This ended in both states being taken over by Britain as crown colonies, till resettlement should permit the concession of self-government. £3,000,000 was granted by the government to the Boer farmers, after the war, to aid in restocking their farms. In 1903 a tract of country of about 7000 sq. m. was transferred to the colony of Natal. The revenue in 1910 was £5,600,000, and the expenditure close on £6,000,000. The chief sources of revenue are customs, the mines, and stamps. The public debt under the South African Loan and War Contribution Act (partly shared by the Orange Free State) is £40,000,000, to be repaid within fifty years. In December 1906 self-government was granted to the Transvaal. Under the Union of South Africa (1910) the Transvaal sends 8 elected members to the Senate and 36 to the House of Assembly; while the province has its own Administrator, Provincial Council of 36 members, and Executive Committee of 4. The province is specially favourable for agriculture and stock-rearing, and about 50,000 acres are under cultivation. Gold-mining is extensively carried on, principally in Witwatersrand and Barberton. Upwards of 200,000 persons (21,000 whites) are employed at the gold-mines, and the output is over 7,300,000 ounces a year. Coal-mining is on the increase. The diamond-mines output reaches in some years over £2,250,000. There are also deposits of copper, iron, tin, and lead. In 1904–10 Chinese labour was employed for mining purposes, with restrictive conditions. The area is about 110,500 sq. m.; and the pop. in 1911 was 1,676,611, of whom 420,831 were whites, 1,224,155 natives, and 31,625 of other coloured races. In 1900 about 30 per cent. of the whites were Boers, the others being mostly British-born or colonial. The natural seaports of the Transvaal are Delagoa Bay and Durban, 348 and 441 miles from Pretoria respectively. Both are connected with Pretoria and Johannesburg by rail. Johannesburg is the largest town (pop. 121,000); Pretoria (30,000) is the capital of the province and seat of the Union government.

See, besides official publications and annuals, works by Voigt (1899), Jeppe (1906), Van Praagh (1907); his memoirs by Paul Krüger (1902); and books on South Africa by Theal (4th ed. 1899), Mackenzie (1900), Markham (1901–4), Wilmot (1901), and Worsfold (1906).

Transylva'nia, formerly an Austrian principality, since 1868 an integral part of Hungary, is fenced by the Carpathians from Galicia and Roumania. The interior, a plateau crossed by mountain-chains, is drained by the tributaries of the Theiss and the Pruth. The Latin name ('Beyond the Forest') refers to the woods dividing it from Hungary; the Hungarian name Erdély ('Forest Land') is justified by its extensive forests (37½ per cent. of the total area of 21,512 sq. m.). Nevertheless 49 per cent. of the soil, mostly very fertile, is under cultivation or grass. The mineral wealth is great—salt, gold, silver, copper, quicksilver, iron, and lead. Mineral springs abound. The pop., now about 2,800,000, consists of Roumanians (nearly 1,300,000, members of the Greek Church), Hungarians and Szeklers, and Saxons or Germans. Kronstadt, Klausenburg, and Hermannstadt are the chief towns. Transylvania (Dacia) was subdued by Trajan in 107. King Stephen of Hungary (997–1038) began to reduce it; King Geisa II. (1141–61) brought in German (Saxon) colonists from the lower Rhineland, who exercised local self-government; and from the land being divided into seven principal divisions it acquired the name Siebenbürgen—i.e. the Seven Strong Towns. See works by Boner (1865) and Gerard (1888).

Trapani (Trap'anee; anc. Drepănum), a seaport of Sicily, stands on a tongue of land 40 miles W. of Palermo, but 141 by rail. Since 1860 most of its fortifications have been removed to make room for promenades, gardens, and new streets; and the place is plentifully supplied (since 1891) with good water brought 60 miles. Pop. 60,000. Off here the Carthaginians defeated the Romans in a great naval battle (249 B.C.).

Trappe, La, a narrow valley in the Norman dep. of Orne, near Mortagne. Its Cistercian abbey (12th c.) was reformed in 1662 by the Abbé de Rancé into the rigorous Trappist community.

Traquair, a Peeblesshire parish, 1½ mile S. of Innerleithen.

Trasimene Lake, a shallow Italian lake lying between the towns of Cortona and Perugia. Girt by hills, it is 10 miles long by 8 wide, and in some parts 20 feet deep. There is no outlet; the flat and reedy margins have been planted with eucalyptus trees. In 1894 the government sanctioned a scheme for draining the lake, which is memorable for Hannibal's great victory in 217 B.C. over the Romans.

Traun See. See Gmunden.

Travancore, a protected state between the sea and the Western Ghats (q.v.) in the extreme south of India, bounded N. by Cochin, and ending in Cape Comorin; area, 7130 sq. m.; population, close upon 3,430,000—mainly Hindus, belonging to 420 castes, from Brahmans to Negroid hill-men. Nairs are over 25 per cent., Mohammedans only 7. There are many native Christians of the Syrian rite, and some black Jews. Westward of the hill-foots is a level belt, 10 miles wide, covered with cocoa-nut and areca palms. The lagoons or backwaters along the coast Travancore shares with Cochin. Towns are the capital, Trivandram (pop. 60,000), Aulapolai, and Quilon. See a work by Mateer (1883).

Travemünde. See Lübeck.

Travnik, a town of Bosnia, once its capital, 45 miles NW. of Sarajevo by rail; pop. 7000.

Traz-os-Montes ('Beyond the Mountains'), a province of NE. Portugal; area, 4160 sq. m.; pop. 600,000.

Trebbia (anc. Trebia), a southern tributary of the Po, which rises in the Apennines. Here Hannibal routed the Romans, 218 B.C.

Trebizond' (Old Gr. Trapezous; mediæval Lat. Trebisonda; Turk. Tarabzûn), the capital of a province of NE. Asia Minor, and a flourishing Black Sea port. It is surrounded by walls, outside which are Christian suburbs. The harbour is only a roadstead, but there is regular communication with Constantinople, the mouth of the Danube, and the Mediterranean. The city's silk manufactures are decaying. On the capture of Constantinople by the Crusaders in 1204 one of the imperial Byzantine family, Alexis, founded the Empire of Trebizond—which stretched from the Phasis to the Halys—and repelled the Turks till 1462. Pop. 50,000.

Trede'gar, a town of Monmouthshire, 12 miles WSW. of Abergavenny and 7 ENE. of Merthyr-Tydvil. Grown from a mere village since 1800, it stands in a district rich in coal and ironstone, and is the seat of huge iron and steel works. Pop. (1851) 8305; (1881) 18,771; (1911) 23,601.

Tregar'on, a Cardiganshire town, 10 miles NE. of Lampeter.

Tréguier (Tray-ghee-yay'), a port in the dep. of Côtes-du-Nord, Renan's birthplace; pop. 3000.

Treig (Traig), LOCH, a loch of SW. Inverness-shire, 5⅛ miles by ¾, 784 feet above sea-level. Mountains (2000 to 3658 feet) overhang it, and it is skirted by the West Highland Railway.

Treinta y Tres (Tray-in-ta ee Trays), an eastern dep. of Uruguay (area, 3686 sq. m.; pop. 35,000). Its name commemorates the thirty-three patriots who revolted against Brazil in 1825.

Tremad'oc, a Carnarvonshire village, 1½ mile WNW. of Portmadoc.

Trengga'nu. See MALACCA, STRAITS SETTLEMENTS.

Trent, a river of central England, the third in length, rising on Biddulph Moor, NW. Staffordshire, and flowing 150 miles SE. and NE. through the counties of Stafford, Derby, Leicester, Nottingham, and Lincoln, till it unites with the Ouse to form the Humber, 15 miles W. of Hull. It receives on the right the Sow, Tame, Soar, and Devon, and on the left the Blythe, Dove, and Derwent; passes Burton, Nottingham, Newark, and Gainsborough; and is navigable for barges to Burton (117 miles), for vessels of 200 tons to Gainsborough (25). Canals connect it with many great Midland towns. See Cassell's Rivers of England (1889).

Trent, a small lake flowing by the Trent River into Lake Ontario. By this valley a canal is being made to connect the Georgian Bay of Lake Huron with Lake Ontario (200 miles).

Trent (Ital. Trento; Ger. Trient; Lat. Tridentum), a town of Austria, in the S. Tyrol, on the Adige's left bank, 145 miles by rail SSW. of Innsbruck and 59 N. of Verona. The cathedral, begun in 1212, is a beautiful specimen of Lombard Romanesque. The church of Santa Maria Maggiore (15th c.) was the meeting-place (1545–63) of the famous Council. Other buildings are the former Jesuits' church, ornamented with the richest marbles; the theatre; the town-hall; some noble private mansions; and the feudal Palazzo Buonconsiglio adjoining the town, now a barrack. Trent manufactures silks, wine, pottery, confections, and sugar, and has a brisk transit trade. Pop. 30,000. Italian from 1809 to 1813, Trent is still quite Italian in aspect, language, and habits; and the restoration to Italy of it and the district (Trentino), with Trieste, is the aim of irredentist agitation.

Trentham Hall, the Duke of Sutherland's seat, 3 miles S. of Stoke-upon-Trent, demolished 1912. The grounds are now public.

Trenton, (1) the capital of New Jersey, is on the Delaware River, at the head of tide-water and of steam-navigation, 57 miles by rail SW. of New York. The city, divided into Trenton and South Trenton by Assanpink Creek, has wide, straight streets, in the residence portions delightfully shaded. The public buildings include a state-house, federal buildings, a county court-house, city hall, and state lunatic asylum, arsenal, penitentiary, reform school, and normal school. The Delaware, which is crossed by two fine bridges, is utilised for water-power. Trenton is the chief centre in the United States of the production of crockery and pottery, but also manufactures iron, steel, zinc, rubber goods, fire-bricks, &c. On December 26, 1776, Washington here surprised 1500 Hessians, and captured nearly 1000, after crossing the Delaware during the night, amid blocks of floating ice and in the face of a fierce snow-storm. Pop. (1880) 29,910; (1910) 96,815.—(2) Capital of Grundy county, Missouri, on the Crooked Fork of Grand River, 102 miles NE. of Leavenworth; pop. 6000.

Trenton Falls, a village of New York, on West Canada Creek, 17 miles by rail NW. of Utica, celebrated for five beautiful cascades, with a fall of nearly 400 feet in 2 miles.

Tresco. See SCILLY ISLANDS.

Tresilian, a Cornish village, 3¼ miles ENE. of Truro. Here Sir Ralph Hopton surrendered to Fairfax (1646).

Treves (Treevz; Fr. Trèves; Ger. Trier), a city of Rhenish Prussia, on the Moselle's right bank, between low vine-covered hills of ruddy sandstone, 69 miles by rail SW. of Coblenz and 111 SSW. of Cologne. The river is crossed here by an eight-arch bridge, 623 feet long, whose Roman piers date from 25 B.C. 'A quiet, old-fashioned town, Treves,' Freeman says, 'has a body of Roman remains far more numerous and varied than any other place north of the Alps can show.' These include the 'Porta Nigra,' 118 feet long and 95 high; the so-called Roman baths (more probably part of an imperial palace); and a basilica built of Roman brick by Constantine, but partly demolished to make room for an electoral palace in 1614. This, however, was removed, and the basilica fitted up for a Protestant church in 1856. Beyond the walls are the ruins of an amphitheatre that could seat 30,000 spectators; and 6 miles off is the 'Igelsäule' or 'Heidenthurm,' a monumental column, 71 feet high, sculptured with bas-reliefs of the 2d c. The cathedral is an interesting structure, chiefly of the 11th c. Its 'Holy Coat,' which consists of 'connected fragmentary particles of material,' is said to have been brought to Treves by the Empress Helena, but is first referred to in 1106, and was not a source of revenue till 1512. It was visited by nearly two million pilgrims in 1891, the first time of exhibition since 1844. Connected with the cathedral by a cloister is the beautiful Liebfrauenkirche (1243); and there is a library of over 150,000 volumes and many MSS. A university (1472) was suppressed in 1798. The manufactures comprise woollens, cottons, and linens. Pop. (1871) 21,442; (1910) 49,112.

Treves, which claims to be 1300 years older than Rome, derives its name from the Treviri, who in Cæsar's time dwelt between the Meuse and the Rhine. Their capital, Augusta Trevirorum, seems to have become a Roman colony under Augustus, and ultimately was a frequent residence of the emperors, especially Constantine. Sacked by Attila in 451, it passed to the Franks in 463, to Lorraine in 843, to Germany in 870, and back to Lorraine in 895, and was finally united to Germany by the Emperor Henry I. Its archbishop was an Elector of the Empire. The last elector removed to Coblenz in 1786; and Treves was the capital of the French dep. of Sarre from 1794 till 1814, since then belonging to Prussia. See Freeman's Historical Sketches (1876) and Clarke's Pilgrimage to Treves (1892).

Treviso (Tray-vee'zo), a town of Italy, 17 miles N. of Venice. It has a Duomo dating from the 15th c., with pictures by Titian, the older Gothic church of San Nicolo, a public library (50,000 vols.), and a fine theatre. Pop. 41,000.

Trichinop'oli, a town of Madras Presidency, on the right bank of the Kaveri, 56 miles from the sea. The fort, which includes the old town, is dominated by gneiss rock 273 feet high, on which are two temples. The moat has been laid out as a boulevard, and the Nawab's palace, which was restored in 1873, has been utilised for offices. St John's Church contains the tomb of Bishop Heber. The troops are stationed 1½ mile south of the fort. There are a market (1868), military and town hospitals, and an observatory. Cheroots are largely manufactured, also hardware and jewellery. A railway to Madras was opened in 1875. Pop. 123,000.

Trient (Tree-ent'). See TRENT.

Trier (Treer). See TREVES.

Triermain, a fragment of an old castle, near Bewcastle, Cumberland.

Trieste (Tree-est-ay or Tree-est'; Slav. Térst), the most important seaport of Austro-Hungary, and the chief trading town on the Adriatic, stands at the head of the Gulf of Trieste, an arm of the Gulf of Venice, 370 miles by rail SSW. of Vienna. In 1849 it was constituted an imperial free city, and attached and belonging to it is a territory 36 sq. m. in extent. The old town, built on the slope of a steep hill, crowned by a castle (1508–1680), is distinguished by its narrow streets and black walls. It contains the cathedral, a Byzantine edifice (5th–14th c.), into whose walls stones bearing Roman inscriptions have been built, and whose tower rests on the foundation of a temple of Jupiter. The new town or Theresienstadt, with broad rectangular streets and handsome houses, occupies the plain that fronts the sea. Between these two divisions runs the Corso, the chief thoroughfare. The splendid Tergesteo (1840), in the new town, contains an exchange and reading-rooms, and the offices of the Austrian Lloyd's. Trieste, which from 1719 till 1st July 1891 was a free port, has a very fine new harbour (1868–1910). The extensive industries include shipbuilding, rope-making, and the manufacture of boilers, anchors, cables, soap, rosoglio, white-lead, and leather. Pop. (1810) 29,908; (1900) 134,143; (1911) 229,475, mostly Italian-speaking. Trieste (anc. Tergeste, or Tergestum) was of importance under the Romans. In 1382 it passed finally to Austria. Charles Lever and Sir Richard Burton were consuls here.

Trik'hala, a town of Greece, in Thessaly, 40 miles W. of Larissa, manufactures cottons and woollens. Pop. 20,000. Trikhala, the Trikka of Homer with a temple of Æsculapius, was ceded to Greece in 1881.

Trim, the county town of Meath, on the Boyne, 30 miles NW. of Dublin by rail, with imposing ruins of a 12th-century castle, the Yellow Steeple (125 feet) on the site of an ancient abbey founded by St Patrick, and a column to Wellington, who had his first schooling here. Close by are the ruins of Newtown Abbey and the Priory of St John the Baptist, and 5 miles down the river are the noble ruins of Bective Abbey. Pop. 1500.

Trinacria. See SICILY.

Trincomalee (usu. Trin'comalee'; really Trincomah'lee), a former naval station and magnificent harbour of Ceylon, 110 miles NE. of Kandy. Here the Malabar invaders of Ceylon built the 'Temple of a Thousand Columns,' to which pilgrims flocked from all parts of India, but which was demolished in 1622 by the Portuguese. The place was next held by Dutch and French alternately, until it became British in 1795. In 1898–1904 it was strongly fortified. Pop. 15,000.

Tring, a market-town of Hertfordshire, on a spur of the Chilterns, 2 miles W. of Tring station, and 31 NW. of London. Situated near the Icknield Way and the Grand Junction Canal, it has a good church, and manufactures of silk, canvas, and straw-plait. Tring Park, built by Wren for Henry Guy (c. 1670), is the seat of Lord Rothschild, whose son has here established an important Natural History museum (1892). Pop. 4500.

Trinidad' is the most southerly of the British West India Islands, only 7 miles from the coast of Venezuela, the Gulf of Paria (an extremely safe anchorage) lying between. It is 50 miles long, 30 to 35 miles broad, and 1755 sq. m. in area. Three mountain-ridges run east and west, one fringing the north coast and reaching 3000 feet. The Pitch Lake, near the village of La Brea, is composed of a solid mass of asphalt, about one hundred and ten acres in extent, and 80 feet above the sea; hundreds of thousands of tons are taken away annually, chiefly for paving. The soil is very rich and productive. The climate is hot and moist, but not unhealthy. The chief town, Port of Spain, is one of the finest towns in the West Indies (pop. 65,000). There is another town called San Fernando (pop. 8000). The chief products are cocoa, sugar, rum, molasses, coffee, coconuts, tobacco, bitters, asphalt, and fruit (exported since 1889). Pop. (1871) 109,638; (1881) 155,128; (1911) 330,074, mainly French (speaking a patois), with Spanish and English colonies, and many East Indian coolies. There are 54 miles of railway in the island, which with Tobago forms a crown colony. Trinidad was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and settled in 1532. It suffered at the hands of the English (Sir Walter Raleigh in 1595), the Dutch (1640), and the French (1677 and 1690). In 1797 it first fell to the British, who were confirmed in it in 1802. See works by Hort (1865), Wickham (1872), De Verteuil (new ed. 1884), J. H. Collins (2d ed. 1888), L. M. Fraser (1894), and Stark (1900).

Trinidad, a small Brazilian island in the Atlantic, in 20° 30′ S. lat., and 700 miles E. of the coast of Brazil, reported to contain pirates' buried treasure. See Knight's Cruise of the Alert (1890).

Trinidad, capital of Las Animas county, Colorado, on the Purgatory River, 210 miles S. by E. of Denver. Coal is found here. Pop. 11,000.

Trinity, a northern suburb of Edinburgh.

Trinity, a river of Texas, formed by two forks near Dallas, runs 500 miles SSE. to Galveston Bay. It is navigable for steamboats for over 300 miles, except in the dry season.

Trip'oli (Tarâbulus), easternmost of the Barbary States, was long Turkish, and in 1911–12 was annexed by Italy. Stretching along the greater and lesser Syrtes (the gulfs of Cabes and Sidra), it is bounded W. by Tunis, S. (very vaguely) by the Libyan Desert and Fezzan, E.—if we include the plateau of Barca (q.v.)—by Egypt, and N. by the Mediterranean. The area is roughly estimated at 399,000 sq. m.; the pop. at over 1,300,000—Libyan Berbers, Moors, and a few Arabs—with 3000 Europeans, chiefly Maltese, and 24,000 Jews. The Atlas range terminates here in two chains (4000 feet). Rain seldom falls during the long hot summers, but the heavy dew supports vegetation in favoured spots. The coast-region (about 1100 miles long) is very fertile about Tripoli and Mesurata, where tropical fruits, grain, wine, cotton, madder, &c. are produced; but further east, along the Gulf of Sidra, reigns sandy desolation. The interior yields senna, dates, and galls, and the carob and lotus are indigenous. Sheep and cattle, small horses, and strong mules are reared. The commerce consists in exporting the products of the country and of the interior of Africa (gold-dust, ivory, natron, and ostrich feathers). The imports (chiefly European manufactures) have been declining. Tripoli is subdivided into four livas or provinces—Tripoli, Benghazi or Barca (q.v.), Mesurata, and Gadames. Fezzan is but nominally attached to Tripoli. From the Phœnicians Tripoli passed to the rulers of Cyrenaica (Barca), from whom it was wrested by the Carthaginians. It afterwards belonged to the Romans, the Arabs, Spain, and the Knights of St John, and after 1551 to the Turks. In 1911 Italy invaded it, and while war went leisurely on, by decree annexed it.—The capital, Tripoli (anc. Œa), on a point of rocky land projecting into the Mediterranean, has high walls, gardens, mosques, and churches; pop. 20,000. Derna is a good port.

Trip′oli (Tarâbulus, or Atrâbulus), a seaport of Syria, 40 miles NNE. of Beyrout. In and around the town are many remains of antiquity and traces of Saracenic architecture. Originally an important maritime city of Phœnicia, the ancient Tripolis was taken by the Crusaders in 1104, and retaken by the Mamelukes in 1289. The old town being in ruins, a new one was built about 5 miles inland on a spur of the Lebanon range. The harbour is small and shallow, and the trade has mostly shifted to Beyrout. Pop. 30,000.

Tripolit′za (officially Tripolis, 'three cities'), a town of Greece, under the Turkish rule capital of the Morea, 40 miles SW. of Corinth, in a plain 3000 feet above the sea. It derives its name from being near the sites of the three ancient cities Tegea, Mantinea, and Pallantium. Pop. 11,000.

Tristan Da Cunha (Coon′ya; wrongly spelt Tristan d'Acunha), an island in the South Atlantic, with two smaller ones adjoining, lies midway between South America and the Cape of Good Hope, in 37° 6′ S. lat. It is 21 miles in circumference, rugged and precipitous, rising in a central conical mountain to 7640 feet. Discovered by the Portuguese in 1506, and named after the commander of the expedition, it was occupied by American sealers in 1790–1811. Possession was taken of it in 1817 by Britain to keep watch on Napoleon, then a prisoner in St Helena. On his death in 1821 the soldiers were withdrawn, all but a Corporal Glass and two companions, who, with some whalers founded the present settlement. The colony flourished, and in 1829 numbered 27 souls; in 1873, 80; and in 1905, 75. The settlement is in a fertile tract to the north-west, and is called Edinburgh. Property (including some 600 cattle and as many sheep) is practically held in common; there is no strong drink and no crime; and the natives are healthy and long-lived, the oldest acting as governor. Nearly all the able-bodied men were drowned in December 1885 while attempting to board a vessel. During the American war the Shenandoah landed forty Federal prisoners here without providing for them. Inaccessible Island, 20 miles distant, harboured two Germans, who underwent a kind of Robinson Crusoe experience there (1871–73). Nightingale Island lies 10 miles farther.

Trivandram. See TRAVANCORE.

Troitsk, a town of Russia, 400 miles NE. of Orenburg. Pop. 37,000.

Tromsö, a town of Norway, on the eastern shore of the low, fertile island of Tromsö, which is nearly 5 miles long, and 1¼ mile broad. Pop. of island, 82,000; of town, 7000.

Trondhjem (Trond′yem; Ger. Drontheim), the third town of Norway, on the south side of the long and narrow Trondhjem Fjord, 250 miles N. of Christiania by rail. It is built on undulating slopes, and has regular and broad streets, the houses being mostly of wood, though the building of new wooden houses is now forbidden by law. The (fortified) harbour is capacious, deep, and safe, but difficult of entry. The cruciform cathedral, dating partly from the 13th c., is of English-Norman architecture, and unquestionably the most interesting church in Norway. A great fire in 1530 destroyed most of it except the richly adorned octagonal choir (late Gothic). From 1818 the place of coronation of Norwegian kings, it has been carefully restored since 1880. Portions of an old archiepiscopal palace (Kongsgaard) also survive. The main emporium of a wide district, Trondhjem has a large trade by sea and land, exporting copper ore, herrings, train-oil, timber, &c. It was the ancient capital of Norway, originally called Nidaros, founded in 996, and became in 1152 the seat of an archbishop. Its decline dates from the Reformation. Pop. 45,000.

Troon, a seaport and watering-place of Ayrshire, 6 miles N. by W. of Ayr and 31 SW. of Glasgow. The harbour, undertaken by the Duke of Portland in 1808, and completed at a cost of more than half a million, is protected by a breakwater 1000 yards long. Golf-links were laid out in 1878; and Troon also has splendid sands and good sea-bathing. Pop. 6600. See Kirkwood's Troon and Dundonald (2d ed. Kilmarnock, 1881).

Troppau (Trop-pow), the capital of Austrian Silesia, on the Oppa, a tributary of the Oder, 184 miles by rail NE. of Vienna. It has manufactures of cloth, beet-root sugar, &c. Pop. 30,000.

Tros′sachs, a wooded defile of Perthshire, 8 miles W. by S. of Callander, which Scott's Lady of the Lake has made one of the places of pilgrimage of the world. It extends 1 mile eastward between Lochs Katrine and Achray, and to the north has Ben A'an (1851 feet), to the south-west Benvenue (2393 feet).

Trouville (Troo′veel), a popular French watering-place, dep. Calvados, at the mouth of the Tougues, 10 miles SW. of Honfleur. It has famous oyster beds and fine sands, and was discovered by Alexandre Dumas. Pop. 6500.

Trow′bridge, a market-town of Wiltshire, on a rocky hill above the small river Biss, 12½ miles by rail SE. of Bath and 12 SSW. of Chippenham. A Norman castle at Court Hill has vanished. The fine Perpendicular church of St James (1475) has a spire 159 feet high; Crabbe the poet was rector from 1814 to 1832, and is buried in the chancel. A new town-hall was opened by the Duchess of Albany in 1889; and there are also a market-house, public gardens (1884), cottage hospital (1886), waterworks (1873), &c. Trowbridge has been a seat of the woollen manufacture since Henry VIII.'s reign; and superfine broadcloth and kerseymere are largely manufactured. Pop. 11,500.

Troy, the city of Priam, whose ten years' siege by the Greeks forms the theme of Homer's Iliad, has through Dr Schliemann's excavations (1870–82) been successfully identified with the mound of Hissarlik, in the Troad (Asia Minor), 2 miles from the Hellespont. See Schuchhardt's Schliemann's Excavations (Eng. trans., 1891).

Troy, capital of Rensselaer county, New York, on the east bank of the Hudson River, at the head of steamboat navigation, and 5 miles by rail above Albany, is built upon an alluvial plain 3 miles long and on the hills to the east (the southernmost known as Mount Ida). It has a marble court-house, the Troy Savings Bank building, including a fine music-hall, a high school, the Rensselaer polytechnic, and a R. C. seminary. Cotton, hosiery, paper, stoves, car-wheels, bells, engines, machinery, stoneware, &c. are manufactured, and there are foundries, breweries, distilleries, flour-mills, and a number of shirt and collar factories employing 8000 girls. Two bridges cross the Hudson to Watervliet (pop. 12,967). Troy was settled by the Dutch in 1659, and incorporated in 1816. Pop. (1850) 28,785; (1900) 60,651; (1910) 76,813.

Troyes (Trwah), a town of France, the capital formerly of the province of Champagne, and now of the dep. of Aube, on the Seine's left bank, 104 miles ESE. of Paris by rail. In spite of modernisations it is still an old-fashioned place, with many quaint timbered houses. The principal buildings are the cathedral, a splendid specimen of Flamboyant Gothic, founded in 872, and rebuilt between the 13th and 16th centuries; the churches of St Urban, the Madeleine, St Pantaléon, and St Rémi; the Hôtel de Ville (1624–70); and a public library with 150,000 vols. and 5000 MSS. Troyes carries on cotton, linen, and woollen manufactures. Pop. (1872) 38,113; (1911) 55,486. The capital of the Celtic Tricassii, Troyes was called by the Romans Augustobona, later Civitas Tricassium, and then Trecæ, whence the modern name. Under the Counts of Champagne it rose in the 12th c. to great importance, and so late as 1600 had over 60,000 inhabitants.

Trujillo (Troo-heel'yo), a town of Spain, the birthplace of Pizarro, in Cáceres province, 60 miles NE. of Badajoz. It manufactures linen, leather, and pottery. Pop. 12,500.—(2) An episcopal city of Peru, capital of the dep. of Libertad, on a fertile plain near the sea-coast. Pizarro founded it in 1535. Pop. 8000.—(3) A port of Honduras, on the north coast. Pop. 4000.

Truro, a city of Cornwall, of which it is considered the metropolis, though Bodmin is the county town, stands 12 miles NNE. of Falmouth and 54 W. of Plymouth, at the junction of the Allen and the Kenwyn, here met by a tidal inlet, the Truro River. The ancient Cornish bishopric of Truro was revived in 1876; the cathedral, a granite Early English structure (1880–87), incorporates a portion of the old parish church of St Mary's (1518). A very ancient municipal borough, Truro returned two members from 1239 till 1885. Pop. 11,350.

Truro, a Nova Scotian manufacturing town of 6000 inhabitants, at the head of Cobequid Bay, and 62 miles NNE. of Halifax by rail.

Tsad, Lake. See Chad.

Tsaidam. See Tibet.

Tsaritzin, or Tsaryzin, a great port on the lower Volga, in Saratoff province; pop. 75,000.

Tsarskoye Selo (Tsars-ko-yay Say-lo), 18 miles S. of St Petersburg, with palaces; pop. 25,000.

Tsi-nan, a city of China, on the Ta-tsin River, 100 miles from the Gulf of Pe-chi-li, with large manufactures of silk and glass; pop. 250,000.

Tsing-tau, capital of the German protectorate of Kiao-chau, a free port with a good harbour, growing trade, and a railway to Tsi-nan.

Tsitsihar, a town of Manchuria, on the Vladivostok branch of the Trans-Siberian Railway, 250 miles SW. of Aigun; pop. 30,000.

Tsu, a maritime town of Japan, 50 miles ESE. of Tōkyō, with many fine temples; pop. 46,000.

Tsuruoka, a town of the main island of Japan, 70 miles NE. of Niigata. Pop. 20,500.

Tsu-shima, a Japanese island (two islands at high water), 40 miles in length, half-way between the southern end of Japan and Corea, and dividing the Corean Strait into two channels. In the main channel was fought, on 27th and 28th May 1905, the great naval battle in which the Russian Baltic fleet under Rozhdestvensky was annihilated by Togo's fleet.

Tuam (Too'am), a town of County Galway, 130 miles NW. of Dublin by rail, on a branch of the Clare. It is the seat of a R. C. archbishop and of an Anglican bishop. Pop. 2890.

Tübingen (Tü'bing-en, nearly Tee'bing-en), an important town of Würtemberg, 20 miles SW. of Stuttgart (35 by rail), on a ridge between the Neckar and the Ammer. It is an old place, steep and irregular; but the suburbs, especially round the new university and the railway station, have wide and spacious streets. Book-printing, bookselling, milling, dyeing, &c. are carried on. The university, founded in 1477, had Reuchlin and Melanchthon amongst its teachers. The Thirty Years' War fatally checked its prosperity; and it was not till early in the 19th c. that it began to renew its old standing. Under the theologian Baur (1826–60) it became celebrated as headquarters of the 'Tübingen School;' and both medical and philosophical faculties are distinguished. It has 94 professors and teachers, a library of 500,000 volumes (located in Duke Ulrich's Schloss, on the hill above the town, dating from 1535), and nearly 2000 students. Uhland was born and long lived here. Pop. 20,000.

Tucson (Tew'son), capital of Pima county, Arizona, on the Santa Cruz River, 978 miles by rail SE. of San Francisco, with some trade in wool, hides, stock, and gold-dust. Founded by the Jesuits in 1560, it was the capital of Arizona from 1867 to 1877. Pop. 13,200.

Tucuman', a north-central province of the Argentine Republic, with an area of 8926 sq. m. and a pop. of 300,000. The capital, Tucuman, on the Rio Sil, 723 miles by rail NW. of Buenos Aires, was founded in 1564. Pop. 65,000.

Tudela (Too-day'la), a cathedral city in the Spanish province of Navarre, on the left bank of the Ebro, here crossed by a seventeen-arch bridge, 46 miles NW. of Saragossa; pop. 10,000.

Tuge'la, a river of Natal (q.v.) and Zululand.

Tula (Too'la), a town of Russia, 110 miles S. of Moscow by rail. It manufactures iron and steel goods, especially firearms. Pop. 135,000.—Area of Tula government, 12,000 sq. m.; pop. 1,800,000.

Tulare Lake (Tu-lair; Span. pron. Too-lah-ray), in Central California, is 33 × 22 miles, and has no visible outlet.

Tuldja (Tool'ja; Roum. Tulcea), a Roumanian port in the Dobrudja, just where the Danube divides into its three main branches. Pop. 22,000.

Tuli, a tributary of the Limpopo (q.v.), flowing from Matabeleland. At Fort Tuli the trade-route and telegraph from Bechuanaland cross the river.

Tulla, a Clare market-town, 10 miles E. of Ennis. Pop. 500.

Tullamore', the chief town of King's County, Ireland, is situated on the Grand Canal, 59 miles WSW. of Dublin by rail. Pop. 5000.

Tulle (Tüll, nearly Teel), capital of the French dep. of Corrèze, at the confluence of the Solane and the Corrèze, 61 miles ENE. of Périgueux. Its 12th-century cathedral was partly demolished in 1793; the chief industry now is the manufacture of small-arms. Pop. 17,000.

Tullow, a market-town, 9 miles SE. of Carlow. Pop. 1900.

Tummel. See Rannoch.

Tunbridge, or Tonbridge, a market-town of Kent, 29½ miles SE. of London, stands on the Medway, which here divides into six streams, one of them called the Tun. A castle, originally Norman, but largely rebuilt in 1280–1300, and held successively by Fitz-Gilberts, De Clares, Audleys, and Staffords, retains a fine Decorated gatehouse. The parish church, also Decorated, was almost rebuilt in 1878; and the grammar-school, founded in 1553 by Lord Mayor Sir Andrew Judd, occupies handsome new buildings of 1865. Remodelled in 1880, it has £5500 a year, and over 300 boys; Sir Sidney Smith was an alumnus. The manufacture of toys, boxes, &c., in 'Tunbridge ware' (wood mosaic in veneer) is a specialty. The population is about 15,000. See works by Fleming (1865) and, on the school, by Rivington (1910) and Hughes-Hughes (1893).

Tunbridge Wells, a watering-place in Kent (till 1894 partly in Sussex), 5 miles S. of Tunbridge, and 34½ SSE. of London. It occupies the head and slopes of one of the valleys of the Weald, and has in general a south-west aspect, commanding very fine views. The chalybeate waters, at the end of the 'Pantiles' parade, were discovered by Lord North in 1606, and have been patronised by Henrietta Maria, Catharine of Braganza, Evelyn, Queen Anne, 'Beau' Nash, Richard Cumberland, Dr Johnson, Richardson, Garrick, Chatham, and Queen Victoria. There are a breezy common of 170 acres, a church (1685), a public hall (1870), a pump-room (1877), a friendly societies' hall (1878), a theatre, and a considerable trade in 'Tunbridge ware.' The season lasts from July to September. Tunbridge Wells was incorporated as a municipal borough in 1889, and became 'Royal Tunbridge Wells' in 1909. Pop. (1851) 10,587; (1911) 35,697. See Thackeray's Virginians, and a book by Lewis Melville (1912).

Tundras. See Siberia.

Tunguska, a tributary of the Yenisei (q.v.).

Tu'nis, a French protectorate of North Africa, extending 550 miles along the Mediterranean, between Algeria and Tripoli; area, 45,000 sq. m.; pop., mostly Bedouin Arabs and Kabyles, 1,925,000, including 43,000 Frenchmen, 108,000 Italians, and 12,000 Maltese. Much of the surface is occupied by hills and, towards the south, desert steppes; in the east the land is low and sandy. None of the rivers are navigable, most of them disappearing in the sand before reaching the coast. There is one considerable lake in the north. The soil is largely fertile, producing fine grain-crops; and oranges, dates, figs, olives, grapes, pomegranates, and almonds are raised. The pasturage is good and abundant, except in the height of the dry season, supporting numerous flocks of cattle and sheep. Tunis is rich in all minerals except gold, and very beautiful marble is worked. The annual rainfall varies from 10 to 50 inches. The heaviest rains occur in December and January. Snow falls on the higher altitudes, and the greater mountain-peaks are always snow-clad. Although often trying for Europeans, the climate is not exceptionally unhealthy. The trade of Tunis, mainly with France, Algeria, and Italy, is gradually increasing; the value of the imports (£4,000,000 to £5,000,000 a year) is usually above that of the exports. The chief imports are cottons and textile goods, flour, cereals, colonial wares and wines; the exports, phosphates, olive-oil, wheat, tan, esparto, barley, fruits, wool, sponges, and tunny-fish. There are 1000 miles of railways, with over 2000 miles of telegraphs.

Long identified with the fortunes of Carthage, Tunis was in 1270 invaded by Louis IX. of France, and in 1575 brought thoroughly under the Ottoman power. The Turkish pasha, however, was after 1631 superseded by a native Bey, practically independent, whose successors prospered by piracy, directed against the Christian powers. In the 18th c. Tunis became tributary to Algeria; but in the 19th was again virtually independent. In 1881 a French invasion resulted in a treaty placing Tunis under French protection. This occupation has benefited Tunis and greatly increased the power of France in the Mediterranean, securing many safe harbours, and lessening the strategic importance of Gibraltar and Malta.

Tunis, the capital, is situated on a small lagoon (El Bahira), near the south-west extremity of the Lake of Tunis, and about 3 miles from the ruins of Carthage (q.v.). Several of the mosques are magnificently decorated, as is the bey's palace. The citadel contains a fine collection of antiquities. A channel 100 feet broad and 21 deep has been dredged in the lagoon from Goletta to Tunis, which in 1893 became a seaport. Pop. 170,000, about one-third European. Much has been done for the place by the French. See books by Olivier (1898), Vivian (1899), Besnier (1904), Sladen (1907), Loth (1907).

Tunstall, a parish and former urban district of Staffordshire, since 1910 part of the county borough of Stoke-on-Trent, but since 1885 within the parliamentary borough of Newcastle-under-Lyme. It has a town-hall (1884), manufactures of earthenware and iron, and neighbouring collieries, and at the date of incorporation a pop. of over 20,000.

Turfan (Toor'fan), a city in the east of Eastern Turkestan (part of which is sometimes named after it), on the S. slope of the Tian-shan Mountains and on a tributary of the Tarim. Pop. 30,000.

Turin' (anc. Augusta Taurinorum; Ital. Torino), a city of Northern Italy, formerly capital of Piedmont, and for a time of the kingdom of Italy, is situated in a beautiful plain bounded by mountains, near the confluence of the Po and the Dora Riparia, 54 miles from the Cenis tunnel by rail, and 80 NW. of Genoa. It stands at the meeting-point of several great roads through the Alps, and strategically has been of great importance. Really a very ancient city, it has a very modern appearance. Among its numerous churches are the cathedral, originally built in the 7th c., and reconstructed in 1498; San Filippo, the finest in Turin; La Consolata, containing a wonder-working Madonna; and a Waldensian temple. On a hill near the town is La Superga, a splendid basilica, raised by Victor Amadeus to fulfil a vow, and now the mausoleum of the House of Savoy. The Mole Antonelliana (over 500 feet high) commands a glorious view. Other edifices are the royal and other palaces; the town-hall; the university, with about 2000 students, a library (now national) of 350,000 volumes; and the Accademia delle Scienze (once the Jesuit college). Among famous natives were Gioberti, Cesare Balbo, Cavour, Marochetti, D'Azeglio, and the French mathematician Lagrange. The manufactures include motor-cars, cotton, woollen, and silk fabrics, carpets, velvet hats, paper, iron, pottery, &c. Pop. (1700) 40,000; (1800) 42,000; (1881) 233,134; (1901) 335,656; (1911) 427,733. Turin, originally inhabited by the Taurini, was sacked by Hannibal, and became a Roman colony under Augustus. The capital afterwards of a Lombard duchy, it fell in 1060 to the House of Savoy. It was held by the French (1536–62), and again taken in 1640; and in 1796 it was dismantled, in 1800 united to the French Republic. In 1815 restored to the House of Savoy, it was the capital of Sardinia till 1860, and from then to 1865, of the kingdom of Italy.

Turkestan' (properly Toor-ke-stâhn'; 'the country of the Turks'), a great region of central Asia, stretching E. from the Caspian to beyond Lob-nor (110° E. long.), and S. from Siberia and Dzungaria to Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet. A lofty tableland, the Pamir (q.v.), separates the rivers running E. to the desert of Gobi from those which run to the Sea of Aral, and divides Turkestan into a western and an eastern portion.

Western Turkestan, or simply Turkestan, consists of the great hollow plain of the Caspian and Aral Seas, which occupies its west and centre, and of the hilly and well-watered districts formed by the ramifications of the Tian-shan Mountains and Hindu Kush. The plain is composed of deserts of shifting sand, interspersed with oases, strips of fertile land along rivers, irrigated lands, and occasional tracts clad with coarse thin grass; the eastern districts abound in valleys of remarkable fertility. The climate varies on the plains from extreme cold to burning heat; in the eastern highlands the cold is intense in winter, and the summer is comparatively cool. The rivers are the Syr-Daria or Jaxartes (q.v.), Amu-Daria or Oxus (q.v.), Zarafshan, and Murghab, both of which terminate in marshes. Chief products are fruits, grain, cotton, flax, hemp, tobacco, silk, coal, salt, and sal-ammoniac. Agriculture and the breeding of the domestic animals are the main occupations; but cotton, silk, linen, and woollen goods, shagreen, paper made of raw silk, carpets, &c., are manufactured. Western Turkestan is divided into Russian Turkestan, including Khokand, now Ferghana, in the north and north-east, and the Tekke Turkoman country, with Merv, in the south-west; Khiva, under Russian influence, in the west; Bokhara, in the east and centre; and Afghan Turkestan, including Badakshan and Kunduz, Balkh, Maimaneh, Andkhui, and Sir-i-pul. The population comprises Uzbegs, the dominant race, Turkomans (who, like the Uzbegs, belong to the same Ural-Altaic stock from which the Osmanli Turks of Turkey are descended), Karakalpaks, Kirghiz, Sarts, Tajiks, Persians, Kiptchaks, and a few Arabs, Hindus, and Jews. Of these the Sarts and Tajiks, the original inhabitants of the cities, are of ancient Persian stock, and along with the Uzbegs, Hindus, and Jews form the settled population; the Persians are mostly descendants of slaves; the other races are largely nomad. The prevalent religion is Mohammedanism, and most of the tribes are Sunnites; a few Shîites, Sûfîs, and Buddhists are also found. Pop. of Russian Turkestan, 6,400,000; of Khiva, 800,000; of Bokhara, 1,500,000. The area of Russian Turkestan is 410,000 sq. m.; of Khiva, 25,000; and of Bokhara, 90,000. Turkestan, with Persia, passed to the Macedonians, who made Bactria a Greek kingdom, while the rest was Parthian. Under the Sassanides the Persian boundary was again advanced to the Jaxartes; but invading Turkish tribes from the north-east established themselves between the Oxus and Jaxartes. In the 8th c. the Arabs possessed themselves of Turkestan, which was overrun by Mongol hordes under Genghis Khan. Tamerlane made it the centre of an immense empire, which stretched from the Hellespont to the frontiers of China, and from Moscow to the Ganges. This period was the golden age of Turkestan. But after the death of his youngest son, the empire was split up. The Persians, provoked by the slave-raiding expeditions of the Turkomans, made war on them in 1860 and 1865; the Afghans took possession of several southern districts in 1849–59. In 1864 the Russians annexed Tashkend; in 1864, Samarcand; in 1873, great part of Khiva; in 1876, Khokand; in 1881, Merv. Russian Turkestan contains the provinces of Zarafshan, Semiretchinsk, Syr-Daria, Russian Kuldja, Amu-Daria, Ferghana. A railway 1000 miles long, from Krasnovodsk on the Caspian Sea by Samarcand to Andijan, has wrought a great change in the economical condition of Turkestan. See Schuyler's Turkestan (1877), Vambéry's works, Krafft's book (Paris, 1902), Curtis's (1911), and books named at Bokhara, Merv, &c.

Eastern Turkestan, known formerly as Chinese Tartary, is bounded N. by the Tian-shan Mountains, W. by the Pamir tableland, and S. by the highlands of Tibet or Cashmere. Eastward it sinks to the desert plain of the Gobi, round whose western bay it forms a vast crescent-shaped oasis 4000 to 5000 feet in elevation, drained by the tributaries of the Tarim, a river which flows 1500 miles E. into the desert to the Lob-nor lake. Canals ramify the country, but large areas are very unproductive; and though there are numerous villages and towns, some of them large, the total pop.—some 600,000—is but thin. The country produces gold and abundance of silk; and the inhabitants are skilful in making gold and silver stuffs, carpets, and linen, cotton, and silk goods. The political capital is Kashgar; the commercial capital, Yarkand. Kulja (q.v.), taken by the Russians in 1871, was reoccupied by China in 1881. The language is Turkish, but there are also Tajiks of Persian descent. The country was part of the empire of Genghis Khan, broke up into many petty states (Yarkand, Kashgar, Aksu, Khoten, &c.), and became a province of China in 1758. A rising of the Mohammedan inhabitants took place in 1864, and under Yakoob Beg the country was independent of China till 1877, when the Chinese resumed possession. See books by Sven Hedin (1898–1906) and Aurel Stein (1903–12), both of whom describe the results of excavations of ancient sand-buried cities.

Turkey, or the Ottoman Empire, comprises the wide but heterogeneous territories really or nominally subject to the Osmânlî sultan, in Europe, Asia, and Africa. These territories, which once extended from the Danube to the Cataracts of the Nile, and from the Euphrates to the borders of Morocco, have been greatly reduced in the 19th and 20th centuries. Algiers has belonged to France since 1830; Tunis has been French since 1881; Egypt, though still tributary to 'the Porte' or Turkish government, is since 1882 unlikely to be again a Turkish province; whilst by the decisions of the Berlin Congress of 1878 the tributary states of Roumania and Servia became independent kingdoms, and obtained increase of territory; Montenegro, also independent, secured Dulcigno and Antivari; Austria-Hungary took Bosnia and Herzegovina under its protection; Greece absorbed Thessaly, and Bulgaria was created a tributary principality (with Eastern Roumelia in 1885); Britain occupied, and has since administered, Cyprus. The remainder of the 19th and the first decade of the 20th century were filled with repressions, massacres, and insurrections in Armenia, Albania, Macedonia, Crete, and elsewhere. Efforts, long unsuccessful, at a solution of the Cretan question involved Greece in a disastrous war with Turkey in 1897. The island, more or less autonomous since 1868, was in 1898 placed under a Greek High Commissioner, while remaining under Turkish suzerainty. The success of the Young Turk revolution of 1908, accompanied as it was by a fraternising of the many nationalities—Moslem, Christian, and Jewish—of the Ottoman empire, led, on the one hand, to the cessation of European effort at reform from without in Macedonia and Albania; and, on the other, caused Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria to strengthen their position against a neighbour apparently about to grow in power. Bulgaria declared itself an independent kingdom; Austria-Hungary definitely annexed Bosnia-Herzegovina, at the same time bringing the military occupation of the Novibazar sanjak to an end. The war of 1911 resulted in Italian conquest of Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and the occupation of Rhodes and other islands. Jealousies among the Christians in Turkey—Greeks, Serbs, Bulgars, and Vlachs—and among their independent kinsmen long hindered common action. In 1912, however, Greece, Servia, Montenegro, and Bulgaria (but not Roumania), taking advantage of the Italian war, made renewals of massacre in Macedonia and elsewhere the occasion of a successful war of conquest against Turkey. The Powers insisted that Albania should be an independent state, thereby limiting the acquisitions of the allies on the west coast to the southern part of the vilâyet of Yanina, which became Greek. Greece also obtained the seaboard of Macedonia, the inland portion going to Servia, which divided northern Turkey with Montenegro. The war of the other allies against Bulgaria (1913), in which Turkey and Roumania intervened, limited Bulgaria's share to western Thrace, Turkey recovering Adrianople and other places lost in the previous war. Crete was allowed to unite with Greece. The Ægean islands, except those held by Italy, were nearly all assigned to Greece. Turkey in Europe consists now of a corner of south-eastern Thrace; while Turkey in Asia still spreads from the Euxine to the Red Sea and Persian Gulf. By vilâyets or provinces, the population of European Turkey is estimated as follows: Constantinople, 1,200,000; Adrianople, 620,000; Chatalja (Mutessarifat), 80,000. The most populous vilâyets of Asiatic Turkey are Broussa, Smyrna, Konia, and Sivas, each with over a million inhabitants. Of cities in European Turkey, Constantinople has 1,200,000 inhabitants, and Adrianople 125,000; in Asia, Damascus has 250,000, Smyrna 250,000, Aleppo 200,000, Beirût 140,000, Bagdad 125,000. In Asiatic Turkey the Turks come first, with four million Arabs, besides Greeks, Syrians, Kurds, Circassians, Armenians, Jews.

The area and population of the Turkish empire are estimated as follows:

	Sq. Miles.	Pop.
IMMEDIATE POSSESSIONS—
In Europe	10,000	2,000,000
In Asia	690,000	22,000,000
	700,000	24,000,000
TRIBUTARY STATES—
Cyprus	3,600	300,000
Egypt	363,200	12,000,000
	366,800	12,300,000
Total	1,066,800	36,300,000

The chief river of European Turkey, the Maritza, flows into the Ægean. Owing to oppressive taxation little progress has been made in agriculture. The cultivated products include wheat, maize, rice, rye, barley, millet, besides tobacco and madder. The mineral products are little worked. Sheep and cattle are raised.

Turkey in Asia is more mountainous. The two almost parallel ranges, Taurus and Anti-Taurus, cover almost the whole of the peninsula of Asia Minor (q.v.) or Anatolia with their ramifications and offshoots. From the Taurus chain the Lebanon range proceeds southwards parallel to the coast of Syria, diminishing in elevation in Palestine. The Euphrates, Tigris, Orontes, and Kizil-Ermak are the chief rivers. Turkey in Asia is ill supplied with water; and though the mountain-slopes afford excellent pasture, the plains, and many of the valleys, especially those of the Euphrates, Tigris, and Jordan (in ancient times kept very fertile by artificial irrigation), are reduced by the parching droughts of summer to the condition of sandy deserts. The fertile portions produce abundance of wheat, barley, rice, maize, tobacco, hemp, flax, and cotton; the cedar, cypress, and evergreen oak flourish on the mountain-slopes, the sycamore and mulberry on the lower hills, and the olive, fig, citron, orange, pomegranate, and vine on the low lands. The mineral products are iron, copper, lead, alum, silver, rock-salt, coal (in Syria), and limestone.

The exports of Turkey include cereals, tobacco, raisins, dried figs, olive-oil, silk, wool, mohair, red cloth, dressed goat-skins, excellent morocco, saddlery, swords of superior quality, shawls, carpets, dyestuffs, embroidery, essential oils, attar of roses, opium, fruits, meerschaum clay, honey, sponges, various drugs, madder, gall-nuts, various gums and resins, and excellent wines. The imports are manufactured goods of all kinds, glass, pottery, arms, paper, cutlery, steel, amber, and especially cotton goods. The total annual value of exports is about £18,000,000, and of imports £30,000,000; Great Britain imports to a value of £6,000,000, and exports to Turkey about £8,000,000. The principal ports are Constantinople, Trebizond, and Smyrna. There are about 200 miles of railway open in European Turkey, and in Asiatic Turkey nearly 3000.

The government of Turkey has usually been a pure despotism; the constitution, with two houses, promulgated in 1876, and revoked in 1878, was restored at the revolution of 1908. The sultan is represented in all matters spiritual by the Grand Mufti or Sheykh-el-Islâm, who enjoys considerable influence as head of the Ulema, and in temporal affairs by the Grand Vezîr (or Sadr-A'zam), under whom are the members of the cabinet or divan. Governmental crises are frequent; and palace intrigues have always been a powerful factor in Turkish politics. The governors of the vilâyets or provinces are styled vâlis; each vilâyet is divided into sanjaks, or livas, ruled by inferior officers. The established religion is Islâm or Mohammedanism, but most other creeds are tolerated. Since 1847 schools have been established, and colleges for the teaching of medicine, agriculture, naval and military science, &c.

Long before the Russo-Turkish war of 1877 the Turkish exchequer was evidently on the brink of insolvency. The enormous expenditure of the war, and the loss of valuable provinces, added to the utter disorganisation of Turkish finances. The revenue is about £25,000,000, the expenditure £30,000,000, the deficit being an unfailing feature. The external debt in 1912 was £128,000,000, besides the balance of the war indemnity to Russia (£20,0000,000). The navy, manned by some 13,000 officers and men, was placed under a British admiral in 1914. The empire has an army of 375,000 men, well armed and fairly equipped. In case of war the total force of all arms could be raised to 1,500,000.

A small tribe of Turks forced their way into Armenia in the 13th c., and helped the Seljûks against the Mongols; in the 14th c. the Turks under Osmân or Othmân conquered the Seljûk kingdom, and became known as Osmânlîs or Ottomans. By 1336 they pushed their way to the Hellespont; under Murâd I. (Amurath) they occupied Adrianople and Philippopolis, received homage from the kings of Servia and Bulgaria, and practically held all the Balkan peninsula except Constantinople, which, after much fighting, fell before Mohammed II. in 1453. In the same century they conquered Albania, Greece, the Crimea, &c.; and in the 16th Syria, Egypt, Tunis, Hungary, and south Russia, and had wars with the Russians, Persians, and Venetians. Their star began to decline in the 17th century; in 1682 they were driven back from Vienna, and lost Hungary, Transylvania, and Podolia. In the 18th century the Russians were their most successful enemies, wresting from them the territories from the Dniester to the Caspian. Greece attained independence in 1828, though Egypt failed to throw off its allegiance. The Crimean war (1854–57) was fought in aid of the Turks against the Russians. The next great crisis was the Russian war of 1877–78. The worst Armenian massacres were in 1895–96. Turkey held her own against Greece in 1897. Abdul Hamid was deposed and constitutional government nominally established in 1908. But unrest and intrigue still prevent settled well-being. Of the later history of Turkey some account has already been given.

Turkmanshai (Toork'man-shī), a village of Azerbijan, 65 miles ESE. of Tabriz. Here Persia concluded a treaty with Russia (1828).

Turk's Islands. See Caïcos.

Turnau (Toor-now), a town of Bohemia, on the Iser, 64 miles by rail NE. of Prague. Its specialty is jewellery. Here on 26th June 1866 the Prussians defeated the Austrians. Pop. 6500.

Turnberry, a shattered castle on the Ayrshire coast, 6 miles N. of Girvan. It has claimed to be Robert Bruce's birthplace. A lighthouse (1874) stands within the ruined walls.

Turnhout (Tyrn-howt'), a town of Belgium, 26 miles ENE. of Antwerp. It has a palais de justice (1371), and manufactures of cotton, linen, lace, paper, &c. Pop. 23,000.

Turiff, a police-burgh of Aberdeenshire, 38½ miles NNW. of Aberdeen; pop. 2300.

Turton, a town of Lancashire, 4 miles N. of Bolton; pop. 13,000.

Tuscaloo'sa, once the capital of Alabama, 55 miles by rail SW. of Birmingham, with the state university and insane asylum; pop. 8500.

Tuscany, formerly a sovereign grand-duchy in the west of Italy, lying for the most part, but not wholly, south and west of the Apennines, with an area of 9291 sq. m. The population is about 2,700,000. The north and north-east of the country is filled with mountains, whence numerous rivers flow down to the sea, the most important the Arno. This district is also the source of the Tiber (q.v.). The rest of Tuscany is an undulating region of hill and dale, except the coasts, which are flat and marshy (see Maremma). Tuscany was first constituted in its present dimensions in 1569, when Cosimo de' Medici became Grand-duke. On August 16, 1860, its national assembly pronounced the deposition of the reigning dynasty, and declared for annexation to Sardinia; and in February 1861 it was declared part of the new kingdom of Italy.

Tus'culum, anciently a city of Latium, whose ruins lie 15 miles S. of Rome.

Tuskar Rock, 7 miles NE. of Carnsore Point, Wexford, has a lighthouse 110 feet high.

Tuske'gee, 38 miles E. of Montgomery in Alabama, has a Normal and Industrial Institute for coloured persons (1881) under Booker T. Washington, a coloured man. Pop. 3000.

Tutbury, a town of Staffordshire, on the Dove, 6 miles NW. of Burton-on-Trent, with the ruins of the pre-Norman castle where Mary, Queen of Scots, was twice imprisoned. Pop. 2200.

Tuticorin', a port at the SE. corner of India, 35 miles E. of Tinnevelli by rail, with pearl-fisheries and R. C. missions. Pop. 30,000.

Tuttlingen (Toot'ling-en), a town of Würtemberg, on the Danube, 20 miles WSW. of Sigmaringen. Pop. 16,000.

Tuxford, a town of Notts, 11¾ miles N. of Newark-upon-Trent. Pop. of parish, 1150.

Tver, capital of a Russian government at the confluence of the Volga and Tvertsa, 100 miles NW. of Moscow by rail. It manufactures cottons, hosiery, and nails. Pop. 70,000.—Area of government, 25,225 sq. m.; pop. 2,200,000.

Twat, or Tuat, an oasis in the western Sahara, 1000 miles SW. of Tripoli. Chief town, Ain Salah.

Tweed, the noblest of Scottish rivers, rises far up in Peeblesshire at Tweed's Well, 1500 feet above sea-level, and flows 97 miles NE., E., and again NE. through or along the boundaries of Peeblesshire, Selkirkshire, Roxburghshire, Berwickshire, and Northumberland, till it falls into the German Ocean at Berwick-on-Tweed. It receives the Gala, Ettrick (itself fed by Yarrow), Leader, Teviot, Till, and Whitadder; is tidal for 10 miles, but almost quite unnavigable; and traces the English border for only 18½ miles, so that 'North of the Tweed' is a none too accurate phrase. It is famous for its salmon-fisheries, but more famous far for its memories: 'Which of the world's streams,' asks George Borrow, 'can Tweed envy, with its beauty and renown?' For it flows by Neidpath, Peebles, Traquair, Ashiestiel, Abbotsford, Melrose, the Eildons, Bemersyde, Dryburgh, Kelso, Coldstream, and Norham Castle. Merlin, Thomas of Ercildoune, and Michael Scott—the Tweed has dim legends of these; and its ripple was the last sound heard by a fourth and a mightier wizard than them all, Sir Walter. See Lauder's Scottish Rivers (new ed. 1890); and Veitch's River Tweed (1884).

Tweedmouth. See BERWICK-ON-TWEED.

Twickenham, a town of Middlesex, on the north bank of the Thames, 11½ miles SW. of London. It is a place of many villas, and has been the residence of many notabilities—Catharine of Aragon, Lord Bacon, Lord Clarendon, Pope (who is buried in the church), Horace Walpole (Strawberry Hill still remains, although a good deal altered), Kitty Clive, several of the Orleans family, J. M. W. Turner, Lord Tennyson, &c. Pop. (1851) 6254; (1911) 29,367. See R. S. Cobbett's Memorials of Twickenham (1872).

Tyldesley, a town of Lancashire, 10 miles NW. of Manchester, with cotton-mills and collieries. Pop., with Shakerley, 15,600.

Tyndrum (Tine-drum'), a Perthshire village, 36½ miles by rail E. by N. of Oban.

Tyne, a northern English river, formed by the confluence of the North and South Tynes, a mile NW. of Hexham, and flowing 30 miles E. to the sea between Tynemouth and South Shields. The North Tyne, some of whose head-streams rise in Scotland, 11 miles SE. of Hawick, flows 32 miles S. and SE., and receives on the left the Reed Water. The South Tyne rises on Cross Fell, and flows 33 miles N. and E., receiving the Allen. The scenery of the two head-streams is beautiful, with a wealth of romantic and historical associations. The Tyne itself flows through the richest coal-mining region of Britain, and on its banks stand Corbridge, Ovingham, Newburn, Ryton, Blaydon, Newcastle and Gateshead, Walker, Wallsend, Jarrow, North and South Shields. Affluents are the Derwent and Team. Navigable from Blaydon, 8 miles above Newcastle, from that city to the sea it is one continuous harbour. The salmon-fisheries have declined, but the shipbuilding maintains its importance. The multifarious manufactures carried on on Tyneside (which sadly defile the lower course) are indicated at NEWCASTLE. It and North and South Shields are grouped together as the 'Tyne ports.' The Tyne is also famous among English rivers for its boat-racing. See works by Guthrie (1880) and Palmer (1881).

Tynemouth (Tin'muth), a great watering-place of Northumberland, 9 miles E. of Newcastle, occupies the angle formed by the line of the coast and the Tyne. The county and parliamentary borough comprises the townships of Tynemouth, North Shields (q.v.), Chirton, Cullercoats, and Preston. Edwin, King of Northumbria, founded here, about 627, a church of wood; King Oswald rebuilt it of stone about 640, and probably established the monastery, which suffered much from the Danes. It was refounded in 1090 by Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland. The remains of the priory are chiefly those of the church, which was built about 1100 and enlarged about 1220. The chancel, whose eastern and southern walls are still standing, is one of the most exquisite specimens of Early English. The Lady Chapel, a chantry of the Percies, was founded towards the close of the 14th c. Tynemouth castle was built about 1296. All that remains of it now is the great 14th-century gateway. A wide road extends to Cullercoats called the Grand Parade. The sands are nearly a mile long, and the cliffs are very picturesque. The aquarium (1877–78) is now used for promenade concerts. The pier, over ½ mile long, was built in 1854–92. There is a public library and a fine collection of engravings. A monument to Lord Collingwood, by Lough, was erected in 1845 on Galley Hill. The borough returns one member. Pop. of county and parl. borough (1891) 46,588; (1911) 58,816. See Gibson's Monastery of Tynemouth (2 vols. 1846).

Tyningham House (Tin'ing-am), Haddingtonshire, 2¾ miles NE. of East Linton, the seat of the Earl of Haddington.

Tynwald Hill. See MAN, ISLE OF.

Tyre (Phœn. Sûr or Sôr, 'rock'), a city of ancient Phœnicia, situated in 33° 12′ N. lat. There were two towns—one on the mainland, the other on the island opposite. Tyre was a city on an island in the 14th century B.C., when it is described in an Egyptian papyrus. Explorations were made here in 1874, 1877, and 1881. Alexander the Great made a causeway from the shore, which has increased in breadth to a quarter of a mile by drifting sand. Tyre was enlarged and beautified by Hiram, and sustained sieges by Shalmaneser, Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander (332 B.C.), and Antigonus. Cleopatra received Tyre as a present from Antony; but the last trace of independence was taken from it by Augustus. In St Jerome's time it was again the noblest and most beautiful city of Phœnicia, nay, almost of the whole East. In the 7th c. it came under the Saracens, and so remained until taken and held by the Crusaders (1124–1291). Soon after it was destroyed by the Moslems; a visitor in 1355 found it a mass of ruins. About 1766 the town began to be rebuilt. About 5000 inhabitants now dwell among the ruins. Here Origen and Frederick Barbarossa are buried.

Tyree', an Argyllshire island, 19 miles NW. of Iona. Having a maximum length and breadth of 14 and 6 miles, and an area of 34 sq. m., it is treeless and flat, with a mean elevation of only 20 feet, except in the south, where three hills attain 400 feet. There are a score of fresh-water lakes. Nearly forty Scandinavian forts dot the shores, and there are also a ruined castle, nine standing stones, &c. Pop. 2000.

Tyrnau (Teer-now'; Magyar Nagy-Szombat), a town of Hungary, on the picturesque Waag valley railway, 30 miles NE. of Presburg. 'Little Rome' it used to be called, as residence of the Hungarian primates; its university (1635–1774) was transferred to Pesth. Pop. 15,000.

Tyrol (Tee-rŏll'; in England usually called the Tyrōl'; Ger. Tirol), a crown-land of the Austrian empire, lying between Bavaria, Switzerland, Italy, Salzburg, and Carinthia, and embracing an area of 10,302 sq. m., to which is administratively added Vorarlberg (q.v.), 1005 sq. m., on the western frontier. The province is traversed from east to west by the three chains of the Alps; the central chain (11,000 to 12,500 feet), which is crossed by the road over the Brenner Pass (4588 feet), separates the German from the Italian side. The population consists of Germans (60 per cent.) and Italians (40 per cent.), and numbered 812,696 in 1890 (with the crownland of Vorarlberg), and 1,092,192 in 1910. The people are noted for their fidelity to the Catholic faith and their devotion to their country, but are somewhat backward in education. The more important valleys are formed by the Inn (flowing N. to the Danube) and the Adige (S. to the Adriatic). Pastoral pursuits furnish the chief occupations, though some grain is grown, and considerable attention is paid to the cultivation of the forests (46 per cent. of the area), of fruit, wine (5,720,000 gallons annually), and silkworms. The mines were formerly of great value; but little is now extracted, except salt (at Hall), anthracite, and a little iron. Metal industries flourish in German Tyrol, cotton manufactures in Vorarlberg, and silk in Italian Tyrol. The chief towns are Innsbruck, Trent, Roveredo, Brixen, and Bozen. Tyrol, the ancient Rhætia, was conquered by the Romans under Augustus, and occupied afterwards by the Boiardi (Bavarians) and Langobardi. In 1363 its count bequeathed it to the Duke of Austria, and it has formed an appanage of the House of Hapsburg ever since, except during 1806–14, a period made memorable by the patriotic resistance of Andreas Hofer to French and Bavarians. See W. D. MacCrackan, The Tyrol (1909).

Tyrone (Tī-roan'; Tir-Eogain, 'Owen's country'), an inland county of Ulster, 48 miles long, with an average breadth of 28. Area, including part of Lough Neagh, 1260 sq. m. or 806,658 acres, of which 10,000 acres are barren mountain, 32,000 bog, 70,000 water, roads, &c. The surface in general is hilly, and often extremely picturesque; the highest point is Sawell (2236) in the NE. Except Lough Neagh, the numerous lakes are small. The rivers are the Foyle, Mourne, Blackwater, and Ballinderry. Between Dungannon and Stewartstown there is a small but rich coal-field; marble is quarried; and there are traces of iron, copper, and lead. The climate is moist, and the low lands are often flooded. The soil of the plain is a well-tilled fertile loam; that of the hilly districts, sandy or gravelly; and there is much bog. There are manufactures of linens, coarse woollens, earthenware, whisky, and soap. The chief towns are Omagh (the capital), Strabane, Dungannon, Cookstown, and Aughnacloy; Clogher gives name to both R. C. and Protestant sees. The county has four parliamentary districts. Pop. (1841) 313,011; (1881) 197,719; (1901) 150,567; (1911) 142,668—about 80,000 Catholics, 32,000 Episcopalians, and 26,000 Presbyterians.

Tyrrhenian Sea (anc. Tyrrhenum Mare), the part of the Mediterranean between Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily on the W. and the Italian peninsula on the E.

Tzana, TANA, or DEMBEA, a great fresh-water lake on the high plateau of Abyssinia, south of Gondar. The greatest length is 60 miles; the breadth varies from 30 to 40. It is the main reservoir of the Blue Nile (see p. 508). The water is clear and full of fish; there are many small basaltic islands.

Tzarskoye. See TSARSKOYE SELO.

UBEDA (Oo-bay'da), a town of Spain, 26 miles NE. of Jaen. It contains a large castle, and manufactures cloth, soap, and leather. Pop. 25,000.

Ucayali (Oo-kī-ah'lee), a river of Peru, one of the head-waters of the Amazon, is formed by the Apurimac and Urubamba, and winds more than 1200 miles N. to the Marañon.

Uckfield, a Sussex market-town, on the Ouse, 8 miles NE. of Lewes. Pop. of parish, 3500.

Udaipur (Oodīpore), or MEYWAR, a native state of Rajputana; area, 12,861 sq. m.; population, 1,300,000. The capital, Udaipur (or Oodeypore), on a ridge overlooking a romantic lake, is 140 miles SW. of Ajmere; pop. 46,000.

Uddingston, a town of Lanarkshire, near the right bank of the Clyde, 7½ miles ESE. of Glasgow. It manufactures ploughs, &c. Population, about 10,000.

Udine (Oodee'nay), a walled town of Italy, 85 miles by rail NE. of Venice. It has a Romanesque cathedral, a beautiful campo santo, and, on a hill in its midst, a castle, formerly the residence of the patriarchs of Aquileia. Udine manufactures silk, leather, gloves, &c. Pop. 17,000.

Ufa (Oo'fa), a Russian town, 280 miles ESE. of Kazan; pop. 73,000.—Ufa government was formed in 1865 out of part of Orenburg; area, 47,112 sq. m.; pop. 3,000,000.

Uffculme, a Devon village, on the Culm, 2¾ miles NE. of Tiverton Junction; pop. 1600.

Uganda (Oogan'da), a British protectorate in East Africa extending along the north-west shore of the Victoria Nyanza, first visited (1862) by Speke and Grant, and by Stanley called the 'Pearl of Africa.' It is partly mountainous, partly undulating, partly a plain, and very fertile on the whole and well wooded. The climate is mild (50° to 90° F.). The Waganda, about 3,000,000, are a brave and warlike people, speaking a Bantu language. At the request of King Mtesa, English Protestant missionaries settled here in 1877, and French Catholics followed in 1879. The Christians had much to suffer at the hands of Mtesa's son, King Mwanga, by whose orders Bishop Hannington was murdered in 1885. The presence of Arabs and Mohammedanism further complicated matters, and intestine struggles were not long in breaking out. Meanwhile the French priests obtained ascendency over the king, and in 1892 a war broke out between sections of the people calling themselves respectively Protestants and Catholics (the latter greatly in the majority). By the Anglo-German agreement of 1887 Uganda was recognised as within the British sphere. In 1894 a British protectorate was proclaimed; and since the treaties in 1899–1900 the protectorate includes all the countries between British East Africa, Belgian Congo, Victoria and Albert Nyanzas. Its area is 120,000 sq. m., and the pop. is estimated at 4,000,000. Trade is being developed by the railway (not in Uganda) from Mombasa, which was opened to Victoria Nyanza in 1901. See, besides the travels of Stanley, &c., works by Felkin and Wilson (1881), A. M. Mackay (1890), Casati (1891), Lugard (1893), Portal (1894), Gregory (1901), Johnston (1902), Cunningham (1905), and Roscoe (1911).

Ugbrooke Park, Devon, the seat of Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, 1½ mile SSE. of Chudleigh.

Uglitch (u as oo), a town of Russia, on the Volga, 58 miles W. by S. of Jaroslav. Pop. 10,000.

Ugogo (Oogo'go), an inland province of German East Africa, between Tanganyika and the coast.

Uintah (Yoo-in'ta). See Rocky Mountains.

Uist, North (Oo'ist), an island of the Outer Hebrides, 65 miles SSW. of Stornoway. It is 18 miles long from W. to E., and 3 to 13 wide. The eastern half of it is so cut up by lochs and water-courses as to have the appearance of an archipelago—a brown, peaty, dreary bog, partly relieved, however, by a line of coast hills (1133 feet). The west part as a rule is hilly (1500 feet). Pop. 2900.—South Uist, 36 miles SW. of Lochmaddy in North Uist, Benbecula lying between them, has a maximum length and breadth of 22 and 7¾ miles. Its east coast is much indented by Lochs Skiport, Eynort, and Boisdale. The eastern district is hill or mountainous (2035 feet); the western alluvial and productive. Pop. 3500 crofters, almost all Catholics.

Uitenhage (now called Yoot'enhaig), capital of a district in the Cape Province, 25 miles NW. of Port Elizabeth by rail; pop. 12,000.

Ujiji (Oojee'jee), a town and district (German) on the E. shore of Lake Tanganyika. Near the town is the terminus of a railway (1914) from Dar-es-Salaam.

Ujjain (Oojine'), a walled town of Central India, in Sindia's Dominions, anciently the capital of Malwa, and one of the seven sacred cities of the Hindus, stands on the Sipra's right bank, 30 miles N. of Indore. Pop. 43,000.

Ukerewe. See Victoria Nyanza.

Ukraine (usually Yoo'krayn; Polish, 'frontier country'), long contended for by Poland and Russia, is now Little Russia (see p. 604).

Uleåborg, a seaport of Russian Finland, stands on the Uleå's S. bank, on the E. shore and near the head of the Gulf of Bothnia. It was founded in 1605, and nearly all burned down in 1822. It has dockyards. Pop. 20,000.—Area of Uleåborg government, 63,971 sq. m.; pop. 335,000.

Ullapool, a Ross-shire village, on Loch Broom, 44 miles NW. of Dingwall. Pop. 700.

Ulls'water, after Windermere the largest of the English 'Lakes,' between the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland, 5½ miles SW. of Penrith and 11 ESE. of Keswick. Lying 477 feet above sea-level, it is 7½ miles long, ¼ to ¾ mile broad, and 205 feet in maximum depth. It is divided into three reaches, which increase in beauty and grandeur as one goes up it from Pooley Bridge to Patterdale, a chief feature, lofty Helvellyn (q.v., 3118 feet).

Ulm (Oolm), the second city of Würtemberg, 58 miles SE. of Stuttgart and 91 WNW. of Munich, on the left bank of the Danube, which here receives the Blau and the Iller and becomes navigable. On the Bavarian side of the river is New Ulm (pop. 7593). Ulm till the war of 1866 was a fortress of the Germanic Confederation; its fortifications (1842–66) have since been greatly extended. The beautiful Protestant cathedral, next to that of Cologne the largest church in Germany, was built mainly in 1377–1494. It is 455 feet long, 186 broad, and 134 high; the tower and open-work spire (530 feet, the highest in the world) was only completed in 1890. The splendid organ (1856–88) has 6286 pipes. Other edifices are the 15th-century town-hall, the 'New Building' (1603) on the site of a palace of Charlemagne's, and the Teutonic Knights' Commandery (rebuilt 1718). Leading industries are the manufacture of cotton, woollen, and other textiles, of paper, leather, beer, &c., and Ulm is famed for pipe-bowls and pastry. Pop. (1871) 26,290; (1910) 56,109, of whom one-fourth were Catholics. The Romans had a settlement here. Ulm was in October 1805 the scene of the defeat by Ney of General Mack, and of his surrender with 28,000 Austrians. In 1802 it was attached to Bavaria, and in 1810 became part of Würtemberg.

Ulster, the most northern of the four provinces of Ireland, is divided into nine counties—Antrim, Armagh, Cavan, Donegal, Down, Fermanagh, Londonderry, Monaghan, and Tyrone. The north-eastern portion, now Down, was overrun in 1177 by John de Courci, and was the most permanent seat of English power in the north; but the 'plantation of Ulster' was not effected until the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Of this gigantic scheme of colonisation the chief seat was the county of Londonderry (q.v.). The Scottish element has long been dominant in some parts of Ulster, especially the north-east, but is very unequally distributed. The originally English and Scottish element varies from 75 per cent. in Antrim to about 20 in Cavan. In 1861 the whole pop. of Ulster was 1,914,236 (966,613 Roman Catholics); in 1871, owing to emigration, the numbers were 1,833,228 (897,230); in 1881, 1,730,542 (833,566); and in 1911, 1,194,749, of whom 575,000 were Catholics, 300,000 Presbyterians, 250,000 Protestant Episcopalians. The distribution of confessions varies in different parts—the Protestants numbering 80 per cent. in Antrim, but only 18 per cent. in Cavan. The preponderance of Protestants in parts of Ulster has led to diversity of feeling and aims between Ulster and more thoroughly Catholic parts of Ireland; Ulstermen have offered resolute resistance to Irish Home Rule. Belfast (q.v.) is the most enterprising town of Ulster and of Ireland; flax-spinning is the chief industry after agriculture

Ulundi. See Zululand.

Ulva (u as oo), an Argyllshire island, on the W. coast of Mull, adjoining Gometra. Area, 7½ sq. m.; altitude, 1400 feet; pop. 60.

Ul'verston (locally Ooston), a Lancashire market-town, in Furness (q.v.), near the influx of the Leven estuary to Morecambe Bay, 8½ miles NE. of Barrow-in-Furness and 22 NW. of Lancaster. It stands in a mining and agricultural district, has a ship-canal 1 mile long, and manufactures iron, paper, boots, &c. Population, about 10,000.

Ulwar. See Alwar.

Uman (Oo-man), a town of Russia, 120 miles S. of Kieff, on the Umanka. Pop. 40,000.

Umbal'la, or Ambála, a city of the Punjab, 150 miles N. by W. of Delhi. The new part of the town has straight, wide roads, and a handsome church, club-house, and hotels. It is an important railway junction. The cantonment is 4 miles SE. Pop. 80,500.

Umbria, an ancient division of Italy, W. of Etruria, and N. of the country of the Sabines.

Umrit'sir. See Amritsar.

Unalash'ka. See Aleutian Islands.

Ungava, a former territory including most of Labrador (q.v.) peninsula, now in Quebec.

Ungvár, a town of Hungary, on the Ungh, 325 miles NE. of Budapest; pop. 15,000.

Union, a town of New Jersey, on the Hudson, opposite New York; pop. 20,000.

Union Canal, constructed in 1818–22, extends 31½ miles W. from Edinburgh to the Forth and Clyde Canal, near Falkirk.

United Provinces. See HOLLAND, INDIA.

United States of America, the largest (next to Brazil) and most important republic of the world, embracing nearly one-half of the habitable area of the North American continent, and about three-fourths of its inhabitants. Its area is more than three-fourths that of all Europe; including Alaska, it is almost equal to it; but its population is only about one-fifth of that of Europe. Alaska (q.v.) is rather a dependency than an integral part of the country, which, without it, occupies the central part of the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and from Canada on the north to Mexico on the south. It lies between the parallels 24° 30′ and 49° N. lat., and between the meridians 67° and 124° W. long. Its greatest length, E. to W., is about 2700 miles, and its greatest width, N. to S., about 1600 miles. Its total area is, without Alaska, somewhat more than 3,000,000 sq. m. As compared with Europe the coast of the United States has few indenting bays or projecting peninsulas, though the Gulf of Mexico is of special climatic and commercial importance. Long Island Sound, Delaware and Chesapeake bays, Albemarle and Pamlico sounds, the harbours of Charleston and Savannah, though not great geographical features, are of commercial importance. On the Pacific, Puget Sound, the Bay of San Francisco, and the harbour of San Diego, are almost the only noticeable breaks. Long Island is the largest of the islands.

The two great mountain-systems of North America, one along the western, the other near the eastern border, form the framework or skeleton of the physical structure. In the east are the Appalachians (q.v.), from whose eastern base a coast-plain extends to the sea. Narrow in Maine, the system grows gradually wider, until in North Carolina it attains a width of 200 miles. The southern coast-region seldom exceeds 100 feet above the sea. It has a sandy soil, and many large swamps near the coast. The middle elevated region is diversified by hills and valleys, and has a productive soil. West of the Appalachian system and lying between it and the western highland is the Central Valley, forming part of the great continental depression which extends from the Arctic Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico. It is almost an absolute plain, rising gradually from the Gulf toward the chain of Great Lakes in the north, and toward the mountains on the east and west. The only important departure from the level is the ridge of the Ozark Mountains (500 to 2000 feet), running from S. Missouri through NW. Arkansas. This great valley occupies about one-half the entire area of the United States, and the fertile prairies and bottom-lands of the eastern and central portions make it the most important agricultural basin of the globe. From an irregular line west of the Mississippi River the land rises in an almost imperceptible slope till it reaches the base of the western plateau. Much of this region, known as the Great Plains, has a light rainfall, but affords admirable pasturage.

The western or Pacific system of mountains (see AMERICA) is a great plateau of 4000 to 10,000 feet surmounted by a complex system of ranges, in its widest part more than 1000 miles broad. Of this Cordilleran region the Rocky Mountains (q.v.) form the eastern and the Sierra Nevada (q.v.) and Cascade Mountains (q.v.) and the Coast Ranges the western border. In the ranges of central Colorado alone nearly forty of the summits have an altitude of more than 14,000 feet. In the Wind River Mountains, in Wyoming, are the head-waters of the Colorado, the Columbia, and the Mississippi, the three great river-systems of the United States. Between the Wahsatch Range and the lofty masses of mountains in Colorado is a region furrowed by cañons or gorges, whose sides are nearly vertical; and the bed of the Colorado (q.v.) is in some places more than a mile and a quarter below the surface of the plateau. Between the Wahsatch Range and the Sierra Nevada lies the Great Basin (see GREAT SALT LAKE), much of it an absolute desert. The Sierra Nevada and the Cascade Range (q.v.) are topographically continuous. Most of the peaks of the Sierras are, however, of granite and metamorphic rock, while those of the Cascade Range are volcanic. The greatest altitude is attained in Whitney (14,898 feet); the sublimity of the scenery is justly celebrated (see YOSEMITE). From 40° there extends northward one of the most remarkable groups of extinct or faintly active volcanoes to be found anywhere in the world; the lava overflows in this region cover an area of upwards of 200,000 sq. m. The passage of the Columbia River is a grand cañon more than 3000 feet in depth. North of the Great Basin, between the Cascade Range and the Rocky Mountains, is the Northern or Columbian Plateau. The Shoshone Falls (q.v.) of the Snake River probably rank next to Niagara in grandeur. Between the Coast Ranges and the Sierra Nevada and Cascade Range is a series of broad valleys, in Oregon that of the Willamette, and in California those of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin.

Besides the chain of Great Lakes which forms a part of the northern boundary, there are thousands of lakes in the New England states and in New York, nearly ten thousand in Minnesota, and numerous mountain-lakes among the Cordilleras. The peculiar lacustrine character of the northern portion of the United States is undoubtedly a legacy of the glacial period. The drainage areas may be broadly classified as the Great Lake or St Lawrence, the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Great Basin or interior systems of drainage. The Atlantic system might be subdivided into two classes, one comprising the streams flowing directly to the sea, the other comprehending those of the Central Valley, which discharge their waters into the Gulf of Mexico. Among the rivers of the Atlantic slope are the Penobscot, Kennebec, Merrimac, Thames, and Connecticut in New England, the Hudson, Delaware, Susquehanna, Potomac, James, Roanoke, Neuse, Cape Fear, Great Pedee, Santee, Savannah, Altamaha, and St John's. The Mississippi-Missouri, with its tributaries the Ohio, Platte, Arkansas, and Red rivers, is the chief stream of the Central Valley, and in length and extent of navigable water it surpasses all other rivers of the world. East of the Mississippi are the Mobile and Appalachicola, and to the west the Sabine, Brazos, and Rio Grande. The Colorado, the Sacramento and San Joaquin, the Willamette, and the Columbia are the chief rivers emptying into the Pacific. Owing to the great extent and diversified topography of the United States, there is every variety of climate characteristic of the temperate zone. The annual isothermal lines, except where they are influenced by the two great mountain-systems, pursue a fairly uniform east and west course across the country. A marked difference is, however, observable in the disposition of these lines on maps representing respectively the summer and the winter temperatures. The influence of the oceans and of the Great Lakes is at once apparent, modifying both the heat of summer and the cold of winter, whereas in the interior and in the region of the Cordilleras the extremes of heat and cold are both abnormal. The warm ocean current of the Pacific, which bathes the western coast, produces a more uniform temperature than that of the Atlantic seaboard, along which flows a cold polar current. The annual range of temperature is very great. In winter there sometimes exists at the same instant between the northern and the southern borders a difference of 120°. In summer the diurnal variation of a single locality is in some instances from 40° to 50°. A narrow strip in the south, including the southern portions of Florida, New Mexico, and Arizona, has what may be called a tropical climate. Northern Florida, southern Louisiana, southern Texas, and portions of New Mexico, Arizona, and southern California have a subtropical climate. The sugar and rice regions have a mean annual temperature above 70°. The tobacco region lies between the isotherms of 50° and 60°. The annual temperature of the great cotton region ranges from 60° to 68°, and the prairie regions devoted to the raising of wheat and other hardy cereals seldom have an average temperature above 55°. The rainfall of the United States varies greatly in different sections, not only as to quantity, but as to distribution throughout the year. The eastern part of the country is well watered. The western portion, excepting the strip between the Sierras and the Cascade Range and the Pacific Ocean, and a few limited areas favoured by some peculiar features of topography, has an insufficient supply, and agriculture is dependent for success upon irrigation. Between the two regions is a belt, approximately following the meridian of longitude 100°, in which agriculture may sometimes be carried on without recourse to irrigation, but which in any season is liable to suffer from drought. For the rainfall of the Pacific Coast, see CALIFORNIA. The eastern portion of the United States is in the main well wooded. Forests also occur in northern California, Oregon, Washington, Wisconsin, and Minnesota (the scene of great forest fires in 1894), and in northern Idaho and Montana. The Cordilleran region and the Great Plains are treeless, except upon high plateaus and mountains. The distribution of forests very closely follows the distribution of rainfall.

Besides Alaska and Hawaii, there are forty-nine political divisions. Of these forty-eight are states enjoying the full privileges afforded by the federal constitution, and one, the District of Columbia, is a special district, coinciding with the city of Washington, the capital of the nation, governed by commissioners appointed by the president. Hawaii (1900) and Alaska (1912) are organised territories. Of the total population, 70 per cent. of the inhabitants live in that part of the country which is east of the Mississippi. The greatest density of population is in the region having a mean annual temperature of from 50° to 55°. From this maximum the density rapidly diminishes with the increase or decrease of temperature. There are three cities, New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia, with over 1,500,000 inhabitants; five, St Louis, Boston, Cleveland, Baltimore, and Pittsburgh, have between 700,000 and 500,000. There are forty-two cities having between 500,000 and 100,000; sixty between 100,000 and 50,000, including Honolulu in Hawaii; and 120 between 50,000 and 25,000 inhabitants.

White population alone is given for Alaska. The density is reckoned upon land-area.

Coal, petroleum, and the burnable rock-gases exist in remarkable quantities in the United States, particularly in the region to the east of the Mississippi River. The most important metallic resources of the United States are found in its iron ores, which exist in great quantities in various parts of its territory. Copper is also widely distributed, and so are lead ores, mainly in the form of galena. Zinc is got in Missouri and elsewhere; California produces mercury; Alabama and other states aluminium. Ores of tin show at many points, but so far not of much commercial value. Platinum occurs, though it is not yet economically valuable. From the eastern face of the Rocky Mountains westward to the Pacific coast deposits of varied character containing silver and gold are extremely abundant. In fact, this portion of the Cordilleran region appears to be the richest in precious metals of any equal area in the world. The silver of this district generally occurs in combination with galena, and has thus been won so cheaply and in such quantities as greatly to lower the price of the metal in the world's markets. The Comstock lode of Nevada is remarkable for its great width and the surprisingly rich though widely separated pockets of ores of gold and silver which it afforded. The building-stones of the United States are abundant, and include granites, slates, marbles, limestone, sandstone; also clays, cements, and rich phosphatic rock (for manures). No valuable precious stones have been found in quantity. The mineral springs of the eastern states exhibit no great variety. Hot springs of much medicinal value occur at Little Rock, Arkansas. In the Cordilleran district the number of mineral springs and hot springs is exceedingly great. The country at large has no national system of education. By the constitution of the United States only such powers are vested in the federal government as concern the whole people. Education is left to the states, though the central government has contributed greatly to the encouragement of schools and the integration of systems. The public-school system now is practically co-extensive with the nation; elementary denominational schools are neither numerous nor largely attended. Universities and colleges, though still in most cases denominational, show a tendency to lose that character. Many have been founded by states or private persons. There is much confusion in the use of the terms college and university. The former in the best usage means an institution for general preparatory study leading to a bachelor's degree; the university, nearly always combined with a college, is for research and professional work. Of some 600 universities and colleges, about 140 are for men only, 100 for women only. Of 200,000 students women form about one-third. Important universities are Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, Michigan, Johns Hopkins, Clark, Pennsylvania, California, Chicago, Cornell, Leland Stanford Junior, Wisconsin, and the Catholic University of America. The schools of all grades enrol approximately 20,000,000 pupils. Of this number over 18,000,000, or 91 per cent., belong to public institutions; the remaining 9 per cent. to denominational and private schools. Among the professions medicine ranks first in number of schools (287), theology second (184), and law last (114). The schools of theology have over 11,000 students, of whom about 500 are women. In the schools of law are 20,000 students, and in medicine (including surgery, dentistry, pharmacy, and veterinary science) there are as many as 36,000 students. There are also 540 business schools, with 135,000 students; 108 colleges for women, with 20,600 students, in addition to 43,600 female students in other colleges and universities. There are besides schools for deaf-mutes, the blind, the feeble-minded, and reform schools for the wayward. The total amount expended on elementary and secondary public schools, from all sources (from permanent endowments, property-tax, local or general, &c.), is about $500,000,000; the income of universities and colleges is about $80,000,000. The number of teachers in common schools increased from 200,515 in 1870 to 523,000 in 1910.

The first census of the Union was taken in 1790, when it comprised thirteen states; in 1820 there were twenty-three states and three territories; in 1860 thirty-three states and five territories; in 1880 thirty-eight states and nine territories; in 1900 forty-five states and five territories; in 1910 forty-seven states and two territories (both since admitted as states), not including the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and dependencies. The table shows the continental population.

265,683 American Indians and 145,602 Asiatics are included in the total for 1910.

In 1910, 16·3 per cent. of the white population was foreign-born, 19·3 per cent. of these being from the United Kingdom, and one-half of these again from Ireland. There is no state church in the United States. In 1910 the Roman Catholics claimed to have over 12,000,000 of the population; the Methodists, 5,750,000; Baptists, 5,700,000; Presbyterians, 1,830,000; Lutherans, 2,000,000; Congregationalists, 700,000; and the Episcopal Church, 900,000. In 1910 farms had a total acreage of 873,729,000. About 200,000,000 acres were under maize, wheat, and oats, and the total production was 5,000,000,000 bushels. Potatoes, rye, barley, buckwheat, rice, sugar, cotton, tobacco, hemp, flax, hops, are other crops. Cattle numbered 69,000,000; sheep, 57,200,000; swine, 47,800,000; horses, 21,000,000; mules, 4,000,000. The total value of farm animals exceeds 5000 million dollars. The United States produces about three-fourths of the world's cotton, and the value of the crop amounts to some $800,000,000. There are over 1,000,000 acres under tobacco, and the value of the crop is over $90,000,000. The census for 1909 shows an increase in the textile industries over that of 1905 amounting to more than $900,000,000, the total value of the product being $931,500,000. The pig-iron industry, which in 1885 produced 4,000,000 tons, produced in 1910 27,300,000 tons; steel in the form of ingots and direct castings aggregated 26,000,000 tons in 1910, against 1,700,000 in 1885. The total value of the manufactured products of the United States in 1910 was over $20,767,000,000. The minerals (chiefly coal and pig-iron, followed by anthracite, copper, petroleum, and gold) have a value of $2,000,000,000. There are in the United States over 26,000 miles of navigable rivers; of railways, 250,000 miles; of tramways and electric railways, 40,000 miles; and of telephones, 16,000,000 miles of wire. The value of lumber is about $600,000,000 a year; of the fisheries, $50,000,000. The imports in 1912–13 were of the value of $1,923,500,000. The exports for the same year amounted to $2,600,000,000. The chief trade is with Great Britain, which receives more than one-fourth of all the exports, and supplies nearly a sixth of the imports. The leading exports are bread-stuffs, cotton, meat, and dairy produce, mineral-oils, animals, iron and steel and manufactures, wood and manufactures, tobacco, &c.; the principal imports, sugar, coffee, iron and steel manufactures, flax, hemp, jute, and their manufactures, chemicals, and woollen and cotton goods. Foreign commerce of recent years has been carried on largely in foreign bottoms, but efforts are now being made to increase the United States mercantile marine. In 1912 there were registered 12,263 sailing-vessels of 2,534,325 tons, and 14,265 steam-vessels of 5,179,858 tons. The navy has been to a great extent reorganised, and in 1912 comprised, besides old vessels, &c., 32 battleships, 36 cruisers of all kinds, with torpedo boats and destroyers and submarines, and 40 vessels of all classes building, with 2500 officers and 50,000 men, including marines. The standing army limit was raised in 1901 to 100,000 men. The militia is supposed to comprise all men in each state, from eighteen to forty-five, capable of bearing arms; the returns show only 10,000 officers and 110,000 men. The federal revenue in 1911–12 was $992,249,230. In the same year the expenditure was $965,273,678. The gold, including reserve and trust funds, amounted in 1912 to $1,987,683,528, and the outstanding principal of the public debt was $919,067,020.

The head of the executive of the United States is a president, who is commander-in-chief of the army, navy, and militia, and exercises a veto on the decisions of Congress. President and vice-president are chosen, for four years, by electors appointed by the several states of the Union. The president chooses a cabinet of nine members, each having charge of an administrative department, but none of them having a seat in Congress; the senate must approve the president's choice. The legislative power belongs to the Congress, which comprises a Senate and a House of Representatives. Senators are chosen, two from each state, by the several state legislatures, and hold office for six years. The Senate has the power of confirming or rejecting treaties with foreign powers. The House of Representatives is composed of members elected biennially by the several states, the franchise not being precisely similar in all the states. Usually the electors are all male citizens of 21 years of age. Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Utah, Washington, California, Oregon, Illinois, Arizona, and Kansas give women the privilege. The number of representatives for each state is proportional to population. The territories of Alaska and Hawaii send delegates, who may speak but do not vote. Senators and representatives have a salary of $7500, with travelling expenses. Each state in the Union has its own constitution, which provides for a governor, legislature of two houses, and distinct judicial system. The details vary considerably in the various states, but are analogous to the constitution of the Union. The state legislature is supreme in all matters except those reserved for the Federal government.

The first settlements in North America north of Mexico were made by the Spaniards in Florida and the French on the banks of the St Lawrence. In 1607 the Virginia Company settled the first permanent English colony at Jamestown in Virginia. The Pilgrim Fathers arrived at New Plymouth in 1620; ten years later the colony of Massachusetts was established; and in 1643 Massachusetts, New Plymouth, Connecticut, and New Haven constituted the United Colonies of New England. Maryland, Carolina, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania were formed; and when in 1732 Georgia was founded, the coast was pretty well occupied by English colonies. The English area was enormously increased after the great struggle with France (1690–1763), when in 1763, by the peace of Paris, France gave up all her claims to Canada and all lands east of the Mississippi and north of Florida. Spain also ceded most of her holdings. In the great revolutionary struggle which followed on the Declaration of Independence (1776) there were thirteen states, the western boundary of the colonies being practically the Alleghanies; by the peace of 1783 the United States acquired all the land westwards to the Mississippi. In 1803, by the 'Louisiana Purchase,' the western part of the basin of the Mississippi passed to the republic. In 1819 Florida became part of the national territory. Texas was annexed in 1845; New Mexico, part of Arizona, and California were added in 1848. In 1787 it had been fixed that no states north of the Ohio should be slave-holding states. At all extensions of area there had arisen fierce struggles between those favourable and those hostile to the increase of the slave-holding area. The great question was finally settled by the civil war of 1861–65, when the southern states of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, were overcome by the Union. In 1867 the United States purchased Alaska from Russia, and the boundary dispute with Britain was settled in 1903. The war with Spain in 1888–89 resulted in the loss to Spain of Cuba, and in the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and Guam (Caroline Islands) being made dependencies of the States; the Hawaiian Islands (1889) and part of Samoa (1900) have also been added, and the Panamá Canal Zone (1904).

See AMERICA and the articles on the several states; the U.S. census reports; North America in 'Stanford's Compendium,' by Hayden and Selwyn; Shaler's Geography of North America; works on the resources and industries of the U.S., by Bishop (1864), Bolles (1881), Patton (1888); works on the constitution, by Story, Kent, Wharton, Curtis, Cooley, De Tocqueville, and Bryce; histories of the literature, by Tyler (1878), Nichol (1882), Richardson (1888); and general histories by Gay, Bryant, Macmaster, Hildreth, Doyle, Payne, Goldwin Smith (1894), and others.

Unna (Oon'na), a Prussian town of Westphalia, 15 miles E. of Dortmund. Near by are the famous Königsborn salt-works. Pop. 18,000.

Unst, an island in the extreme north of Shetland, 38 miles N. by E. of Lerwick. It is 12½ miles long, 2 to 6 miles wide, 934 feet high, and 46¾ sq. m. in area. Pop. 2000.

Unterwalden (Oonterval'den), one of the four 'Forest Cantons' of Switzerland, forms part of the hill country round the Lake of Lucerne; area, 295 sq. m.; population, 30,000. It is divided into two parts, Upper and Lower; the capital of the Obwald is Sarnen, and of the Nidwald Stanz. See Sowerby's Forest Cantons (1892).

Unyanyem'be (u as oo), a district of German East Africa, between Tanganyika and the coast.

Unyo'ro (u as oo), a province of Uganda between Buganda and the Albert Nyanza.

Upavon, a Wilts village, on the Avon, 9 m. ESE. of Devizes, with an army and navy flying school.

Uper'nivik. See GREENLAND.

Uphall, the parish containing Broxburn (q.v.).

Upholland, a Lancashire town, 4 miles W. of Wigan. Pop. 5200.

Upolu (Oo'poloo). See SAMOA.

Uppingham, a market-town of Rutland, 2½ miles WNW. of Seaton by a branch-line (1894), 12 SW. of Stamford, and 83 NNW. of London. The parish church, of which Jeremy Taylor was rector, was mainly rebuilt in 1861; but the feature of Uppingham is its public school, founded in 1584 by Archdeacon Robert Johnson (1540–1625). With an endowment of only £1000 a year, it owes its development from a mere grammar-school to Edward Thring, its headmaster from 1853 to 1887. He found it with only 25 boarders, and left it with 330; to him was due the building of the great schoolroom, chapel, gymnasium, and swimming-bath. Pop. 2600. See his Life (1898) and Uppingham School Roll (3d ed. 1906).

Uppsala (Oopsâh'la), the historic centre of ancient Sweden, stands on a little stream that runs down to Lake Mälar, 41 miles by rail N. by W. of Stockholm. Its existing importance is due to its being the seat of Sweden's only archbishop, and of the principal university. The Gothic brick cathedral was founded in 1289, completed in 1435, partly burned down in 1702, and only partly restored. It contains the tombs of Linnæus and Gustavus Vasa and some other Swedish kings. The university, founded in 1477, though new buildings were erected in 1877, is attended by 2000 students, and possesses a library (1620) of 400,000 volumes and 15,000 MSS., an observatory, botanical garden, &c. In the older town, around which on E. and N. new suburbs have been built, there stands the castle of Gustavus Vasa (1548). Pop. 27,000. About 3 miles NE. lies Old Uppsala, where are three vast tumuli of the ancient legendary kings; and 4 miles SE. are the Mora stones, on which the old kings used to take the oaths of good governance.

Upton-on-Severn, a Worcestershire town, 5½ miles NNW. of Tewkesbury. Pop. 2220.

Ural (Ooral), a river of Russia, rises on the E. side of the Urals in Orenburg government, and runs 1450 miles SSW. to the Caspian, being practically the boundary between Europe and Asia. For the Ural Mountains, see Russia, p. 603.

Uralsk (Ooralsk), a Russian town, on the Ural's right bank, 280 miles N. of its mouth in the Caspian Sea; pop. 60,000.—Area of Uralsk government, 140,000 sq. m.; pop. 800,000.

Urban'a, capital of Champaign county, Ohio, 95 miles NNE. of Cincinnati. It manufactures woollens, carriages, glue, &c. Pop. 8000.

Urbino (Oorbee'no; anc. Urbinum Hortense), a city of Central Italy, nestling among wooded hills, between the rivers Foglia and Metauro, 29 miles from Faro station (97 miles by rail SE. of Bologna). It is a town of narrow, tortuous streets, with an archbishop's cathedral; a magnificent ducal palace (1447; restored, and now housing the fine art institution); a free university (1564) with some 90 students; and the house in which Raphael was born, now the town museum. Urbino was the seat of a line of independent dukes from 1474 to 1631. Pop. (commune) 20,000.

Ure, a river in the North Riding of Yorkshire, flowing 50 miles E. and SE. till at Myton it joins the Swale to form the Ouse.

Urfa, a modern name for Edessa (q.v.).

Urga (Oorga), the religious and political capital of Outer Mongolia, on the river Tola, 180 miles SE. of Kiachta, on the trade-route to Peking. Its college of Mongolian priests is the seat of the Bogdan or Lama of the Mongols. Pop. (partly living in tents outside the city proper) 30,000, of whom 6000 or 7000 are Chinese.

Urgel (or Seo de Urgel; Oor-hel), a town in the Catalonian province of Lerida, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Pop. 3000. See Andorra.

Urgenj. See Khiva.

Uri (Ooree), one of the 'Forest Cantons' of Switzerland, forms part of the hill country which surrounds the Lake of Lucerne; area, 416 sq. m.; population, 23,000. It consists of the Reuss's valley, traversed by the great road and the railway into Italy over the St Gothard Pass. Altorf (q.v.) is the capital. See Sowerby, The Forest Cantons of Switzerland (1892).

Uriconium. See Wroxeter.

Urie. See Inverurie.

Urmia (Oor'meea), a town of the Persian province of Azerbijan, 10 miles W. of the Lake of Urmia; pop. 32,000. It was said to be Zoroaster's birthplace. The Lake (4500 feet above the sea) measures 90 miles by 25; contains numerous islands; has no outlet, but many feeders, some 80 to 150 miles long; is intensely salt; and is only 12 to 40 feet deep.

Urr Water, a Kirkcudbrightshire stream, flowing 27 miles S. by E. to the Solway Firth.

Uruguay (Ooroogwī'; formerly known as the Banda Oriental or 'Eastern Bank'—i.e. of the Uruguay) is the smallest of the South American republics, although its area—72,110 sq. m.—is three-fifths that of the United Kingdom. The Atlantic washes its shores for 120 miles, the Plate and Uruguay rivers for nearly 600 miles; the Rio Negro flows across the central portion. The country is full of low hills or ranges, the highest reaching only 1650 feet. Gold and copper mines are worked, but little has been done to exploit the varied mineral wealth of the country. The normal temperature is between 35° and 90° F. The pop., estimated at 684,000 in 1889, was about 1,300,000 in 1914. It is made up mainly of half-breeds, including Gauchos; but the foreign element, largely Basques and Italians, is rapidly increasing. The leading industry is the raising of cattle and sheep; six-sevenths of all the exports is pastoral and saladero produce. Liebig's factory is at Fray Bentos (q.v.). The chief crops are wheat and maize. The imports have a value varying from $45,000,000 to $50,000,000 per annum; the exports generally exceed the imports in value. Uruguay is divided into nineteen departments. The president is elected for four years, and with a strong military force (8000 men) he is practically master of the country. The navy has only 650 men and officers, manning three gunboats, seven steamers, &c. The revenue varies from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000; the expenditure statistics are not so reliable, but the accounts are supposed to balance, and the debt is $135,000,000 (largely for railways). The state religion is Roman Catholic, but all are tolerated. About 1000 miles of railway are open; and there are 4000 miles of telegraph lines. The chief towns are Montevideo (the capital), Paysandú, Salto, and Mercedes. Uruguay was long a bone of contention between the Portuguese and Spaniards, and, after it became independent (1814), between Brazil and Argentina. In 1828 Brazil and Argentina guaranteed its independence; but a new series of wars began in 1839, and Montevideo sustained an eight years' siege by Rosas, dictator of Buenos Aires. Uruguay, which has been shamefully misgoverned and plundered, joined Brazil and Argentina against Paraguay in 1868. See books on the Plate region by Mulhall and by Levey, and works by W. H. Hudson (1885) and Koebel (1912).

Uruguay River rises in Brazil, and flows nearly 1000 miles W. and S. to form with the Paraná the La Plata (q.v.) estuary. It separates Brazil and Uruguay from Argentina; is much encumbered by rapids; but is navigable to Salto (200 miles).

Urumiah. See Urmia.

Urumtsi (Ooroomtsee), the chief city in Chinese Zungaria, at the N. base of the Tian-shan Mountains. It commands the main route from Mongolia into Eastern Turkestan. Pop. 20,000–30,000.

Usagara (Oosagah'ra), a territory in German East Africa, between Tanganyika and the coast.

Usedom (Oo'zeh-dom), a Prussian island at the mouth of the Oder, shutting off the Stettiner Haff from the Baltic. Area, 157 sq. m.; pop. 35,000. On its E. side is Swinemünde (q.v.), on the SW. the town of Usedom (pop. 1786).

Ushant (Fr. form Ouessant), an island off the W. coast of France, in the dep. of Finisterre, with an area of 20 sq. m. and a population of 2800. Off Ushant on 'the glorious first of June' 1794 Howe gained a great naval victory.

Ushaw, 4 miles WNW. of Durham, the seat of St Cuthbert's R. C. College, transferred hither in 1808 from Crook Hall, having fifteen years before been expelled from Douay.

Usk, a beautiful river of South Wales and Monmouthshire, rising at Talsarn, one of the Black Mountains, and winding 57 miles SE. to the Bristol Channel. The town of Usk, 12 miles SW. of Monmouth, has a ruined castle, and with Monmouth and Newport an M.P. Pop. 1500.

Uskub (u as oo), or SKOPLIE, an old capital of Servia, 130 miles NW. of Salonica by rail, recovered from Turkey in 1912. Pop. 30,000.

Uspallata. See CHILI.

Ussuri. See AMUR.

Ust Urt (u as oo), the desert plateau between the Caspian and the Sea of Aral.

Utah (Yoota), since 1894 a state of the American Union, in the Rocky Mountain region, 350 miles from N. to S., and 280 from E. to W., with an area of 84,970 sq. m. Idaho and Wyoming bound it N.; Colorado, E.; Arizona, S.; and Nevada, W. Utah lies in a great plateau region, having an average elevation of 5000 feet above the level of the sea. The Wahsatch Mountains (12,000 feet), running N. and S., and the Uintah Mountains (14,000 feet), an eastern spur, divide it into two portions differing widely in topography and climate. The division lying N. and W. of these ranges belongs to the great interior basin of the continent, from which no water escapes except by evaporation. The streams which flow from the mountains find their way toward the west, ultimately discharging their waters into Great Salt Lake (q.v.), or into some of the smaller saline lakes or sinks of the desert. In the valleys lying among the western spurs irrigation is practicable, if precarious, depending as it does on the melting snow of the mountains. The prevailing westerly winds are robbed of their moisture by the lofty peaks of the Wahsatch range; and to the E., in the basin of the Colorado River, the towering plateaus which overhang stupendous cañons have but a slight and irregular rainfall, and except in a few favoured valleys agriculture is almost an impossibility. The annual product of copper, lead, silver, and gold is valued at $40,000,000. There is also coal. Besides Salt Lake City, the important towns are Ogden, Provo, and Logan. Pop. (1870) 86,786; (1900) 276,749; (1910) 373,351. Utah formed a part of the territory acquired by the United States from Mexico in 1848, was developed by the Mormons, organised as a territory in 1850, and reduced to its present area in 1868. The polygamy of the Mormons formed the main difficulty in the way of the territory being admitted to the privileges of a state, and this did not take place till 1894, when Mormon supremacy had been abolished and after the Mormons had renounced plural marriages. See histories by H. H. Bancroft (1888) and Whitney (1892–98).

Utakamand'. See OOTACAMUND.

Utica (Yoo'tica), an ancient city of North Africa, 20 miles NW. of Carthage, originally a Phœnician colony on the coast (now 10 miles distant). Its ruins include an amphitheatre, an aqueduct, and the remains of quays. Here the younger Cato killed himself.

Utica (Yoo'tica), a city of New York, 232 miles by rail NNW. of New York City. Rising in a gentle slope from the south bank of the Mohawk River, and traversed by the Erie Canal, it contains a fine United States building, a city hall, state lunatic asylum, and a Masonic Home and School (begun in 1891), is a noted market for cheese, and manufactures boots and shoes, cottons and woollens, organs and pianos, machinery, starch, &c. Pop. (1880) 33,914; (1910) 74,419.

Utrecht (Dutch pron. nearly Ee'trehht; Oude trecht, 'old ford;' Lat. Trajectum ad Rhenum), the capital of a province of the Netherlands, on the 'Old' Rhine (q.v.), 23 miles SSE. of Amsterdam and 38 ENE. of Rotterdam. The walls were levelled in 1830, and formed into shady promenades, the present fortifications consisting of strong forts. St Martin's Cathedral, founded by St Willibrord about 720, and rebuilt in 1251–67, had its nave destroyed by a hurricane in 1674, so that the choir and the tower (321 feet high) now stand separate. The famous university, founded in 1634, numbers over 1000 students, and has a library of 260,000 volumes. Other edifices are the 14th-century Roman Catholic Cathedral, the town-hall (1830), the 'Pope's House' (built by Adrian VI., who was born here in 1459), the palace (in 1807) of Louis Bonaparte, &c. Utrecht since 1723 has been the headquarters of the Jansenists. The manufactures include tobacco and cigars, woollen fabrics and carpets, salt, furniture, chemicals, machinery, &c. Pop. of the town (1869) 59,299; (1910) 120,200. Here was formed the famed union of the northern provinces for the defence of political and religious freedom in 1579; and at Utrecht nine distinct treaties were concluded in 1713, which brought to a close the war of the Spanish succession.

Utrecht, capital of a district in Natal, transferred in 1903 from the Transvaal, 30 miles NE. of Newcastle. Pop. 5000.

Utrera (Ootray'ra), an old town of Spain, 19 miles by rail SE. of Seville. Pop. 14,600.

Uttoxeter (Ux'eter; A.S. Uttocceaster), a market-town of Staffordshire, on an eminence above the Dove, 14 miles ENE. of Stafford. In its market-place Dr Johnson did penance bareheaded; and it has a modern church with an old tower and lofty spire, a town-hall (1855), a mechanics' institute, a free grammar-school (rebuilt 1859), and manufactures of iron, nails, ropes, beer, &c. Pop. 5700.

Uxbridge, a market-town of Middlesex, on the Colne, 16 miles W. of London. It has one church, St Margaret's, restored 1872; another, St Andrew's (1865), with a spire of 170 feet; a town-hall (1836); and a spacious corn exchange (1861). Pop. 10,500. Commissioners met here fruitlessly in January 1645 to discuss terms of peace between Charles I. and the parliament. See Redford's History of Uxbridge (1818).

Uxmal (u as oo), a ruined city in the NW. of Yucatan, 40 miles SW. of Merida, with vast remains of ancient grandeur, temple-terraces, &c.

VAAL (Vâhl), a river of South Africa, rises in the Drakenberg, and flows 500 miles between the Transvaal and the Orange Free State to the Orange.

Valais (Valay; Ger. Wallis), a mountainous Swiss canton, bounded S. by Italy. Area, 2036 sq. m.; population, 130,000. Towns are Sion and Martigny.

Valdai Hills. See VOLGA.

Valdepeñas (Val-de-payn'yas), a town of Spain, 140 miles S. by E. of Madrid. Pop. 23,700.

Val de Travers (French pron. Travayr'), a valley in the Swiss canton of Neuchâtel, with great asphalt-mines.

Valdivia (Val-dee-via), capital of a southern province of Chili, on the Callecalle, 15 miles above its mouth in Valdivia Bay. Pop. 18,000.

Valence (Valon^{g}ss), capital of the French dep. Drôme, is on the left bank of the Rhone (crossed by an iron bridge), below the Isère's mouth, and 66 miles S. of Lyons. It has several interesting Renaissance buildings, an 11th-century cathedral, an 18th-century Protestant temple, and manufactures of silk, glass, iron, &c. Pop. 23,200.

Valencia (Span. pron. c as th), a seaport of Spain, on the Mediterranean, 200 miles SW. of Barcelona by rail. The picturesque walls, erected by Pedro IV. in 1356, were removed in 1871; and the recent houses are a striking contrast to those in the gloomy old town. The archiepiscopal cathedral, commenced in 1262, and 330 feet long, is classical within, and Gothic without. The university has a library of 72,000 vols., and there is a good picture-gallery. Silk-spinning and weaving are carried on, with manufactures of cloths, hats, glass, linen, leather, cigars, and Valencia tiles. Pop. (1877) 143,856; (1910) 233,348.—Valentia, or Valencia del Cid, dating from the 2d century B.C., was destroyed by Pompey, taken by the Goths in 413, by the Moors in 715, and by the Cid in 1094. Suchet captured it in 1812.—The old kingdom of Valencia is subdivided into the three provinces of Valencia (area, 4152 sq. m.; pop. 884,300), Alicante, and Castellon de la Plana.—(2) Valencia de Alcántara, a town, 250 miles WSW. of Madrid; pop. 9250.

Valencia, capital of Carabobo state in Venezuela, close to the beautiful Lake of Tacarigua, 34 miles by rail S. of Puerto Cabello. Pop. 40,000.

Valenciennes (Va-lon^{g}ss-yenn'), a dark, ill-built manufacturing town and first-class fortress of France, in the dep. of Nord, stands at the entrance of the Rhonelle into the Scheldt (which flows through the town in several arms), by rail 155 miles NNE. of Paris and 58 SW. of Brussels. It possesses a citadel constructed by Vauban, a fine hotel-de-ville, and a modern Gothic church, with tower 272 feet high. The famous lace is no longer made here, only a coarse sort. Other manufactures are cambric, cotton yarn, hosiery, linseed-oil, beet-root sugar, and there are great iron-works. The country round about is a great coal-basin. Valenciennes (the Valentinianæ or Valentiana of the Romans) was ceded to France in 1678, and was taken by the Allies in 1793, after a siege of 84 days, but restored next year. It is the birthplace of Watteau and Froissart (statue, 1856). Pop. 35,000.

Valentia, or VALENCIA, a rocky island (5 × 2 miles) off County Kerry, 42 miles by rail WSW. of Killarney, with cliffs nearly 900 feet high at the north end. It is the terminus since 1857-66 of more than one Atlantic telegraph. The name is most likely corrupted from the Irish Fail-inis.

Valenza (Valent'za; anc. Valentia), a town of N. Italy, on the Po, 9 miles by rail N. of Alessandria. Pop. 7466.

Valetta, since 1570 the chief town of Malta, on the NE. side of the island. It occupies a rocky tongue of land over 3000 yards long, on either side of which are two noble harbours, and is defended by fortifications of great strength, many of them hewn out of the solid rock. Noteworthy are the governor's palace—formerly that of the Grand-masters of the order of St John—plain without, but magnificent within; the superb cathedral; and the church of San Pubblio, with its famed sotteraneo ('vault') of embalmed monks and skeletons; the public library of 60,000 vols.; the university; the aqueduct, which brings water 8¾ miles from the far side of the island; and many of the palazzi of the Maltese nobles. There is a railway to Rabat in the interior. Valetta, though much earlier than his date, was named after the Grand-master La Valette. Pop. of Valetta with Floriana and Sliema suburbs, about 40,000; of the other 'three cities' or suburbs of Senglea, Cospicua, and Vittoriosa, 26,700; total, 66,700.

Valguarnera (Val-gwar-nay'ra), a town of Sicily, 16 miles E. of Caltanisetta. Pop. 14,000.

Valladolid (Span. pron. Val-ya-do-leeth'), a fortified city of Spain, sometime capital of the whole country, and still capital of a province of Old Castile, stands on the Pisuerga's left bank, 150 miles NW. of Madrid by rail, and 2200 feet above sea-level. The Classical cathedral (1585) was never finished; the Dominican monastery, of which Torquemada was prior, is now a house of correction, and that of the Benedictines is a barrack. The university dates from 1346. The Scots College here was long the only seminary for the education of Scottish Catholics. There are some manufactures of silk, cotton, and woollen stuffs, iron, jewellery, hats, paper, perfumery, chemicals, gloves, &c. Pop. (1877) 52,206; (1910) 71,700. Valladolid, the Pincia of Ptolemy, appears as Vallisoletum in 1072. Charles V. erected many splendid edifices here, Valladolid being then the most prosperous city in Spain, with 100,000 inhabitants. Formerly capital of Castile and Leon, it was still the usual residence of the kings of Spain. In 1560, under Philip II. (who was born here), Madrid was declared the only court; and Valladolid thenceforth declined. In 1808 it was sacked by the French.—Area of province, 2930 sq. m.; pop. 285,000.

Valladolid, a town of Yucatan, 90 miles ESE. of Merida. Pop. 5000. See also MORELIA.

Valle Crucis Abbey. See LLANGOLLEN.

Vallejo (Val-yay'ho), a port of California, on San Pablo Bay, 31 miles NE. of San Francisco. On Mare Island is a navy-yard. Pop. 11,300.

Valleyfield, a manufacturing town of Quebec, on the St Lawrence, 54 miles by rail SW. of Montreal. Pop. 10,000.

Vallombro'sa ('Shady Valley'), a celebrated abbey among the Apennines, 15 miles E. of Florence, in a valley surrounded with forests of fir, beech, and chestnut trees. Here an order of Benedictine monks was founded about 1038; the present magnificent buildings were erected in 1673. In 1869 the monastery was suppressed; but the place is still much visited by tourists. Milton was here in 1639, Wordsworth in 1837.

Valls, a manufacturing town of Spain, 12 miles N. of Tarragona; pop. 13,000.

Valmy (Val-mee'), a French village in the dep. of Marne, 20 miles NE. of Châlons. At the famous 'cannonade of Valmy,' 20th Sept. 1792, Dumouriez forced the Prussians to retreat.

Valona. See AVLONA.

Valparai'so (ai as ī; 'Vale of Paradise'), the second city of Chili, and a great Pacific port, is situated on the bay of the same name, 115 miles by rail WNW. of Santiago, and 881 W. of Buenos Ayres by the Trans-Andean Railway. The city is built chiefly upon a sloping plain, cut up by ridges terminating in steep bluffs. Its long streets, with imposing churches, trams, gas, and electric light, suggest a European city. The old town, El Puerto, contains the vast customs warehouses, huge elevators, the mole and harbour, wharves, the exchange, post-office, and municipal palace, with a bronze statue of Lord Cochrane; above it rises the Cerro Alegre. Batteries crown the heights. Valparaiso's imports exceed £6,000,000 and its exports £1,000,000. It suffered from earthquakes in 1822, 1851, and 1906, when 5000 persons perished; was bombarded by a Spanish fleet in 1866; and after a three days' battle in the civil war of 1891, fell to the insurgents. Pop. 163,000.

Valparaiso, the capital of Porter county, Indiana, 44 miles SE. of Chicago. Pop. 6280.

Valtelline (Val'tel-leen), the upper Adda's rich valley down to its influx into the Lake of Como.

Valtos, a crofter coast-village of Skye, 13½ miles N. by E. of Portree.

Van, a walled town of Turkey in Asia, the capital once of an Armenian kingdom, near the SE. shore of Lake Van, 145 miles SE. of Erzerum. Pop. 35,000.—Brackish LAKE VAN (80 × 30 miles) has no visible outlet.

Vancouver, a town of British Columbia, the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway (1887), stands on Burrard Inlet (at its head is Port Moody, the former terminus; pop. 3000), 2906 miles by rail W. by N. of Montreal. Its site a dense forest till 1885, it now possesses miles of well-made streets, lit by electricity, electric trams, a fine Anglican cathedral, a handsome opera-house, three parks, wharves and warehouses, and smelting-works. 'The Liverpool of Canada' has one of the finest natural harbours in the world, and trades with the U.S., Japan, China, and Australia. Its pop. grew from 27,000 in 1901 to 128,000 in 1911 (with South Vancouver), and its property assessment from $12,000,000 to $192,500,000.

Vancouver Island, belonging to British Columbia, and separated from its mainland by Queen Charlotte Sound, Johnstone Strait, and the Strait of Georgia, and from the State of Washington by the Strait of Juan de Fuca, is 278 miles long, and 50 to 65 miles broad. Area, 12,760 sq. m.; pop. 50,000. The shores are marked on the W. by deep fiords. The climate resembles that of southern Britain. Fruit-culture is profitably carried on. The island is well wooded and very rich in minerals. Besides gold, silver, copper, iron, &c., it possesses great fields of excellent coal, at Nanaimo in particular. Another source of wealth is in the fisheries. The island was discovered in 1592 by Juan de Fuca, and visited in 1792 by Captain George Vancouver, R.N. (1758-98); but the first permanent settlement was made in 1843, when the Hudson Bay Company built a fort where Victoria, the capital, now stands.

Van Diemen's Land. See TASMANIA.

Vannes (Vann), a French seaport, capital of the Breton dep. Morbihan, stands at the mouth of a tributary of the Gulf of Morbihan. 10 miles from the sea. It has a cathedral (13th to 15th centuries), an old Maison du Parlement, many carved houses, a rich museum of Celtic antiquities, and manufactures of woollens and ropes and some shipbuilding. Pop. 16,000.

Van Wert, the capital of Van Wert county, Ohio, 27 miles WNW. of Lima. Pop. 6430.

Var, a dep. of SE. France, with the three arrondissements of Draguignan (the capital), Brignoles, and Toulon. Area, 2349 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 293,757; (1911) 330,755.

Varal'lo, an Italian town, 35 miles NW. of Novara by rail. Pop. 3500.

Varanger Fiord (Vah-rang'er), a deep inlet of the Arctic Ocean into Finmark, the northernmost province of Norway.

Vardö, a Norwegian fishing-town on Vardö island, at the E. end of Finmark (pop. 2630).

Varennes (Varenn'), a town in the French dep. of Meuse, 18 miles NW. of Verdun. Here Louis XVI. and his family were captured making for the frontier, 22d June 1791. Pop. 1200.

Varese (Varay'zay), a town of N. Italy, at the end of Lake Varese (7 sq. m.), 18 miles by rail W. of Como. Pop. 5872.

Varinas (Vareenas), a town of Venezuela, 100 miles SE. of Lake Maracaybo. Pop. 7000.

Varna, a Bulgarian Black Sea port, 115 miles SE. of Rustchuk by rail. The French and British encamped here in 1854. Pop. 41,400.

Varzin (Var-tzeen'), a Pomeranian village of 1200 inhabitants, 25 miles SE. of Köslin. Near it is a seat of the Bismarcks.

Vasa (Vâh-sa), a county or län of Finland, on the Gulf of Bothnia.

Vasarhely (Vasarhay'lee). See MAROS-VASARHELY.—Hódmezö Vasarhely, a Hungarian town, 20 miles NE. of Szegedin by rail. Pop. 60,830.

Vassilkov, a town of Little Russia, 18 miles SW. of Kieff. Pop. 18,000.

Vatnajoküll (Vatnayo'keel). See ICELAND.

Vaucluse (Vo-clüs'), a dep. of SE. France. Area, 1370 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 263,451; (1911) 238,656.—At the village of Vaucluse (Vallis clausa), 19 miles E. of Avignon, lived Petrarch.

Vaud (Vo; Ger. Waadt), a W. canton of Switzerland, between the Jura and the Bernese Alps. Area, 1244 sq. m.; pop. 320,000, French-speaking and Protestant.

Veglia, an Austrian island in the Adriatic, SE. of Trieste. Area, 165 square miles; pop. 21,140.

Vejle, a port of Denmark, at the head of a fiord on the east coast of Jutland. Pop. 17,300.

Velbert, a town in the Rhine province of Prussia, 15 miles NE. of Düsseldorf. Pop. 20,500.

Vel'des, a summer-resort on a lake in the Austrian province of Carniola, 30 miles NW. of Laibach. It is famous for its sun-baths. Pop. 500.

Velei'a, an ancient Ligurian city, overwhelmed by a landslip (c. 280 A.D.). Its ruins, 20 miles S. of Piacenza, were uncovered in 1760–65.

Vélez-Málaga (Vay'layth-Mah'laga), a Spanish town 16 miles E. of Malaga. Pop. 24,000.

Velletri (Vel-lay'tree), a cathedral city, 25 miles SE. of Rome by rail. Pop. 19,532.

Vellore, a town of British India, 80 miles W. of Madras by rail. Pop. 43,540.

Venaissin (Venayssan^{g}'), an ancient county of France, between the Rhone and the Durance, now included in Vaucluse.

Vendée (Von^{g}day), La, a French dep., bounded W. by the Bay of Biscay. Area, 2588 sq. m.; pop. (1901) 441,311; (1910) 438,520. Its three arrondissements are La Roche-sur-Yon (the capital), Fontenay-le-Comte, and Sables-d'Olonne. The Vendeans stoutly resisted the Revolution.

Vendôme (Von^{g}dōm), a town of the dep. Loir-et-Cher, on the Loir, 42 miles NNE. of Tours and 111 SW. of Paris. Pop. 8450.

Vener. See Wener.

Venetia, the large 'compartimento' or division of NE. Italy, between the Alps and Adriatic, of which Venice (q.v.) is the historical centre.

Venezuela, United States of (Span. pron. Venaythooay'la), a northern tropical republic of South America, on the Caribbean Sea. The total area is under 400,000 sq. m.; the official returns (extending the area at the expense of Colombia and British Guiana) make it nearly 500,000 sq. m. Trinidad and Tobago islands belong to Britain. Venezuela is a land of mountains and valleys in the west and north, of lower mountains and wooded hills in the south, of llanos between the Orinoco and the northern ranges, and of lake and swamp and forest (much of it pestiferous and uninhabitable) in the north-west. The Andes enter the country south of Lake Maracaybo, and push north-eastward as the Cordillera de Merida (15,500 feet). In Mount Roraima (q.v.) the frontiers of Guiana, Brazil, and Venezuela meet. Innumerable streams find a way over waterfalls and rapids to the Orinoco (q.v.), chief of the eight river systems of the country. The climate is moist; the temperature varies from freezing-point above the snow-line to great heat in the coast-towns, valleys, and llanos. There are no active volcanoes, but earthquakes have done great damage—as in 1893 at Merida. Almost everywhere the country is abundantly watered. Vegetation in the hotter region is luxuriant beyond description. In the temperate region coffee is produced. The people are mostly half-breeds—mulattoes or mestizoes (i.e. of crossed white and Indian blood). Pure negroes (mainly on the coast) or whites are few: the latter form perhaps 1 per cent. of the pop.

Venezuela contains rich mineral deposits, as yet scarcely tapped, except for the Yuruari gold-mines, the Aroa copper-mine, the government salt-mines, and coal near Barcelona. Near Lake Maracaybo there are great supplies of petroleum and coal. Gold to the value of £350,000 has been produced in a year, but in 1900–10 the annual value was only about £65,000. There are about 530 miles of railway, besides telegraph and several telephone systems. Most of the over-sea trade is in the hands of foreigners, German and other. The chief export (over two-thirds of the total exports) is coffee; next follow cocoa, gold, hides, cattle, sugar, cotton, copper, dye-woods, &c. The imports (over a fourth from Britain) are flour, cotton, linen, woollen, and jute goods, iron, machinery, &c. The exports have an annual value of about £3,000,000, the imports over £2,000,000. From 1881 Venezuela—formerly comprising twenty-one states and their territories—has been repeatedly redivided into states and territories, with the federal district of Carácas (the capital). The pop. in 1881 numbered (officially) 2,075,245; in 1910, 2,713,703; of these 350,000 are Indians. The revenue (mostly from customs duties) and the expenditure nearly balance each other at from £1,500,000 to £2,000,000. The national debt is £8,500,000. The army numbers 7280, and there is a militia. The principal cities are Carácas, Valencia, Maracaybo, Barquisimeto, Tocuyo, Maturin, and La Guayra. The coast was visited by Columbus in 1498, and next year the name Venezuela ('Little Venice') was given to an Indian village built on piles seen by Ojeda and Amerigo Vespucci. Settlements were made in the 16th and 17th centuries, and the country was plundered by Spanish governors till 1810, when the revolt began which under Bolívar's guidance ended in 1821 in independence of Colombia, Ecuador, and Venezuela. Blanco was practically dictator from 1870 to 1889. Under Castro, superseded in 1910, there was trouble with Britain, United States, Germany, Italy, and Holland. Ven'ice (Ital. Venezia—Ven-etz'ya), the 'Pearl' or 'Queen' of the Adriatic, is 135 miles E. of Milan. In the 5th c. the Veneti, expelled from the mainland by Lombards and Goths, found refuge in the islands of the lagoons. Now Venice covers more than seventy-two islets, or rather mud-banks, its foundations being piles ('time-petrified') and stone. Through its two unequal portions winds for over two miles the Grand Canal, spanned by the Rialto Bridge (of stone) and two others (of iron), and into it flow 146 lesser canals, all bridged at frequent intervals. This vast network of waterway is patrolled by countless gondolas, while the pedestrian has his choice of innumerable lanes (calli). A railway viaduct (1845) 2⅛ miles long connects Venice with the mainland, it being 165 miles E. of Milan and 181 NNE. of Florence. Its population, from well-nigh 200,000 in the 15th c., dwindled to 100,000 in the 18th, but has since increased to over 160,000. Its industries are its famous glass manufacture; jewellery and embroidery in gold and silver; lace, velvets, and silks; candles, soap, sugar, and confectionery. Printing is reviving; while the shipbuilding now includes ironclads. Venice imports from Great Britain coal, iron, fish, and manufactured goods. The shallowing lagoon, which at low ebb looks like so many acres of mud, is connected with the sea by the Lido, Malamocco, and two other entrances. With the drinking-water now supplied from the mainland the health of the city is improving. The Piazza to the W. of St Mark's church is still the centre of civic and social life. Its north side is formed by the Procuratie Vecchie (1517), surmounting an arcade of fifty arches. The Procuratie Nuove, on the south side of the Piazza, now constitute a portion of the Palazzo Reale. Of this the library hall is a masterpiece of Sansovino, its ceiling decorated by the seven best Venetian artists of the time (1582), while Titian, Paul Veronese, Bassano, and Tintoretto contributed splendid work to other parts of the interior. The Campanile, begun 902, and completed by the belfry 1510, collapsed in July 1902, but was rebuilt in 1903–12. The clock-tower gives entrance to the Merceria or main business quarter. In front of St Mark's itself rise three red flagstaffs, from which once floated the silk and gold banners typifying Candia, Cyprus, and the Morea, the three possessions of the republic. The Doge's Palace, dating from the 10th and 11th centuries, has been extended, modified, and restored. It comprises the Sala del Maggior Consiglio, with paintings by Titian, Bassano, Tintoretto, Paolo Veronese, and Palma Giovane; the celebrated library, transferred (1817) from the Palazzo Reale, with 120,000 volumes and 10,000 MSS.; the Museo Archeologico; the Sotto Piombi ('under the leads') where Casanova and Silvio Pellico languished; the Pozzi ('wells') which shadow many a page of Venetian history; and the Bridge of Sighs, leading to the Carceri or public prisons. The Zecca or Mint (now the Bourse) and the granite columns, one bearing the Lion of St Mark, the other St Theodore, have infinitely less to detain us than the Basilica di S. Marco itself, placed by Canova above the cathedrals of Pisa and Sienna as, on the whole, the first of the three finest churches in Italy, whose external mosaics, bronze horses, interior (also ennobled by its mosaics), choir, sacristy, north transept, baptistery, treasury, and pavement have each their special votaries. Dwarfed by comparison, the remaining churches of Venice need be noticed only in groups, of which there are four—the first, Gothic in style, exemplified in the plain, massive, and solemn church of the Frari; the second, the so-called Lombard (really a revival of Romanesque), of which the church of the Miracoli is the type; the third, seen at its best in the Palladian Redentore; and the fourth, or modern Italian, ornate to excess, represented by the church of the Salute. Near SS. Giovanni e Paolo is the statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni, general of the republic (1475), which, designed by Verocchio and cast by Leopardi, is reckoned the finest art-product of its kind in the world. The Scuola of the church of San Rocco is rich in magnificent Tintorettos. The Accademia delle Belle Arti has a wealth of Bellinis (Gentile and Giovanni), Carpaccios, Giorgiones, Palmas (Vecchio and Giovane), Paolo Veroneses, Tintorettos, and Titians; while the Museo Civico attracts the lover of majolicas, gems, carvings, autographs, and miniatures. Interest of a sterner kind clings to the arsenal, founded in 1104, now employing 2000 workmen as the third dockyard of Italy. Its museum forms a running commentary on Venetian history, containing the model of the Bucentaur from which the doge every Ascension Day solemnly espoused the Adriatic. On the Grand Canal, down to the Rialto, are the Palazzo Manzoni (15th c.), Palazzo Corner (16th c.), Palazzo Rezzonico, Palazzo Foscari, Palazzo Pisani a S. Polo, Palazzo Contarini, three Mocenigo palaces, Palazzo Corner Spinelli, and Palazzo Grimani. The Palazzo Moro is the traditional abode of Shakespeare's Othello. In theatres Venice is comparatively poor, La Fenice being the principal one; but in public gardens and islets adapted for holiday purposes it abounds. The Littorale di Malamocco, facing the city across the lagoon (the so-called 'Lido'), is an immensely popular resort. This and the islets Murano (renowned for its glass), Torcello, and Burano (employing 300 girls in the celebrated lace-industry) are easily accessible by steamers and steam-launches.

Venice rises to historic importance in 697 A.D., when the tribunes were superseded by a duke or doge, and gradually obtained a foothold on the mainland and increasing political influence. In the 9th c. Istria and Dalmatia were conquered, and Venice became a dominant power in the Levant, taking an active share in the Crusades; in the 12th it conquered Tyre, Rhodes, and many of the Cyclades, Sporades, and Ionian islands. The Doge Enrico Dandolo (1192–1205) brought about the partition of the empire, and secured for Venice a large slice of Greece and the Greek islands, part of the Balkan countries, and districts on the Hellespont and in Constantinople. Worsted and weakened by Genoa in the 13th c., in the 14th Venice crushed its rival for ever, and became supreme at sea in war and merchandise, commanding the bulk of trade with the East. Next Venice was triumphant on the Italian mainland, and in the 15th c. waged war with Turkey and with France. The Cape route to India and the discovery of America told injuriously on Venetian commerce, and constant wars exhausted the treasury. In the 17th c., however, the republic crushed the Turks in Candia (Crete) and the Morea, but lost both in the 18th. Its policy became utterly feeble, its commerce irretrievably decayed, and when in 1796 Napoleon invaded the republic, it was but the shadow of its former self. In 1798 Austria secured possession, confirmed in 1815. The revolt in 1848 led up to its final cession (1866) to Napoleon III., who handed it over to Victor Emmanuel to become a part of the kingdom of Italy. Ven'lo, a Dutch frontier town on the Meuse, 20 miles W. of Crefeld. Pop. 17,400.

Vennachar. See KATRINE, LOCH.

Veno'sa (anc. Venusia), Horace's birthplace, S. Italy, 25 miles N. of Potenza. Pop. 8414.

Ventimiglia (Ventymeel'ya), a fortified town of the Italian Riviera, near the French frontier, and 3 miles E. of Mentone by rail. It has a cathedral and a small harbour. Pop. 11,500.

Vent'nor, the principal town on the south shore of the Isle of Wight, 11 miles by rail S. by W. of Ryde. Situated amid the finest of the fine scenery of the Undercliff, it has a southern exposure, well sheltered from the north, and so possesses a mild climate, suitable for invalids. Hence from a small fishing-hamlet it has grown since 1830 to a favourite watering-place, with an esplanade (1848), numerous hotels and lodging-houses, and the National Consumption Hospital (1872). The beach is composed of beautiful yellow shingle; and fossils abound in the vicinity. Pop. 5750.

Vera Cruz (Vayra Crooz or Crooth), the principal port of Mexico, on the E. coast, 263 miles by rail E. of the capital. A moist, hot, unhealthy place, with a cathedral, it was founded as Villa Nueva de la Vera Cruz ('New City of the True Cross') by Cortes in 1520. Pop. 45,000.

Vercelli (Ver-chel'lee), a town of N. Italy, 40 miles SW. of Milan, with a modern cathedral, and manufactures of machinery, candles, matches, soap, and musical instruments. Pop. 20,165.

Verd, CAPE. See CAPE VERD.

Ver'den, a town of Hanover, on the Aller near the Weser, 20 miles SE. of Bremen. Pop. 11,000.

Verdun (Ver-dun^{g}'), a fortified French town in dep. Meuse, 35 miles W. of Metz by rail. It has a cathedral, and manufactures iron, liqueurs, sweetmeats, leather, and beer. Pop. 23,100. The fortress has been often beseiged—in 1870 by the Germans for six weeks, when it capitulated.

Vere. See Campvere.

Vereeniging, a town in the Transvaal, on the Vaal, 35 miles S. of Johannesburg, where peace was signed in the Boer war, May 31, 1902.

Vermont′, the only entirely inland state of New England, lies west of New Hampshire, with Canada on the N., and Lake Champlain on the W. Its length from north to south is 140 miles, its width 40 to 90 miles ; and its area 10,200 sq. m. The Green Mountains (Verd Mont—whence the name of the state) extend its entire length, and in four peaks exceed 4000 feet. The mountains are mostly clothed with trees to their summits. The hills furnish the best of pasturage, and, for the most part, can be cultivated to their tops. Vermont is rich in quarries of granite, marble, and slate, which are extensively worked. Steatite, verd-antique, sulphuret of iron, manganese, kaolin, and iron exist. A larger area is devoted to cereals than in any other New England state. The annual production of maple sugar is nearly one-third of the total production of the country. The butter and cheese are of superior quality. The state is divided into fourteen counties, and returns two representatives to congress. Montpelier is the capital. Samuel Champlain, in 1609, was the first white man who looked upon Vermont. The first permanent settlement was made at Brattleboro in 1724. Vermont was received into the Union, March 4, 1791, as the fourteenth state. In the civil war it furnished 35,242 soldiers, or one-half of all its able-bodied men. Pop. (1800) 154,465 ; (1900) 343,641 ; (1910) 355,956.

Vernon (Vayr-nong′), a French town, on the Seine, 15 miles NW. of Mantes. Pop. 7960.

Vernon, a town of Connecticut, 12 miles ENE. of Hartford. Pop. 8600.

Vero′na, a city of Italy, on the Adige, at the base of the foot-hills of the Alps, 72 miles W. of Venice by rail, is a fortress of the first class, a member of the famous Quadrilateral. Its strength now depends on outlying forts. The amphitheatre (2d or 3d c. A.D.) has a lesser diameter of 404 feet. Other Roman remains are gateways, part of a theatre, and some mosaics. The streets are wide, especially the Corso ; there are four principal squares, of which the Piazza dei Signori contains the palace of the Della Scala (1370) and the superb Palazzo del Consiglio. The cathedral dates from 1187, and has an altarpiece by Titian ; the Romanesque basilica of St Zeno is larger and more interesting. The palaces are numerous and fine. The ancient castle of Theodoric is a barrack ; the Castle of the Scalas (1355) is a barrack and arsenal. The picture-gallery is especially rich in pictures of the Paduan, Venetian, and Veronese (Pisano, Morone, &c.) schools. Paul Veronese, though a native, belonged to the Venetian school. Among the glories of the place are the tombs of the Scala family, with their wondrous wrought-iron railing (1350–80). There is a large transit trade with Germany by the Brenner railway, and manufactures of silk, woollens and cottons, furniture, musical instruments, &c. Pop. 82,300. Verona, long the Lombard capital, was afterwards torn by the struggles of Ghibellines and Guelphs, being the home of Shakespeare's Capulets and Montagues. From 1260 to 1387 the Scala or Scaliger family exercised a brilliant tyranny over the city. It fell then to Milan, in 1405 to Venice, and with Venice passed under Austrian domination till 1866.

Versailles (French pron. nearly Ver-sī′), a city of France, capital of the dep. Seine-et-Oise, 11 miles SW. of Paris by rail. A city more of pleasure than of industry, it covers a large area in proportion to its population, and is remarkably regular. It is the see of a bishop, and contains a public library of 50,000 volumes, many palatial edifices, public fountains, spacious squares, and elm-planted avenues. Louis XIII. built here on the site of an old priory a hunting-lodge, afterwards extended into a château. Louis XIV. devoted enormous sums to its embellishment, or rather reconstruction, under the care of Mansard. Here was signed in 1783 the peace of Versailles between England and the United States. Versailles continued a court-residence down to the Revolution, which great event had its beginning here in the meeting of the States-general in May 1789. At this date the pop. was 100,000; the palace, its park, the perfection of formal landscape gardening, and its fountains have been the model of many capitals. Louis-Philippe transformed the palace of Louis XIV. into a museum. The most interesting pictures are those by David (illustrating Napoleon's career), Horace Vernet, Ary Scheffer, and Delacroix. From September 1870 till the conclusion of peace in 1871 Versailles was the German headquarters ; there King William was proclaimed Emperor of Germany, and there the capitulation of Paris was signed. After the peace it was the seat of the government till 1879, and headquarters of the army during the Commune. Pop. 60,500.

Versecz (Ver-shetz′), a Hungarian town, 45 miles S. of Temesvar by rail. Pop. 27,400.

Ver′ulam. See St Albans.

Vervick. See Werwicque.

Verviers (Verv-yay′), a Belgian town, on the Vesdre, 15 miles ESE. of Liége. It is of recent growth, and depends almost wholly on its cloth manufactures. Pop. 47,000.

Vervins (Ver-vang′), a town (pop. 3150) in the French dep. of Aisne, 25 miles NE. of Laon.

Vesoul (Vezool′), capital of the French dep. Haute-Saône, 40 miles W. of Belfort. Pop. 8460.

Vesu′vius, the most striking object seen from the Bay of Naples, a mountain (4206 feet) of dense tufa. The higher Apennine-offshoot, Monte Somma (anc. Mons Summanus), surrounds it on the N. and E. Vesuvius first (63 A.D.) became convulsed by earthquakes, repeated at intervals till 79, when its earliest known eruption occurred (see Pompeii). This was followed by others, as in 472, when its ashes alighted in Constantinople ; in 512, when they were wafted to Tripoli ; in 1036 ; in 1500 ; in 1631 ; in 1793 ; in 1822 ; in 1855 ; in 1861 ; in 1871–72 ; and in April 1906, when lava streams issued and ashes covered a large area, destroying two villages, and breaking down roofs in Naples. The fertility of the slopes of Vesuvius is proverbial, especially in wine. Its observatory (1844) is famous. The first funicular railway to near the summit was opened in 1880. See works by Prof. Phillips (1869) and Lobley (1889).

Veszprim (Vess-preem), a Hungarian city, 25 miles SW. of Stuhlweissenburg. Pop. 14,584.

Vev′ay, or Vevey (Ger. Vivis), a Swiss town in the canton of Vaud, a lovely health-resort, on the N. shore of the Lake of Geneva, 11 miles E. of Lausanne. In St Martin's church (date 1498) Ludlow and Broughton, the regicides, are buried. Chocolate and cigars are made. Pop. 15,000.

Vézelay (Vay'ze-lay'), a small town (pop. 800) in the French dep. of Yonne, 5 miles SE. of Auxerre. Its abbey church was restored in 1868. Hither Becket retired in 1168; here St Bernard in 1145 preached the Crusade; and here Cœur de Lion and Philip Augustus united their forces in 1190 for the third crusade. Beza was a native.

Via-Mala (Veea-Mah'la), a remarkable gorge in the Swiss canton of Grisons, on the course of the Farther Rhine. The roadway (1823) runs for 2 miles in half-open galleries or in a tunnel; the rock-walls on either hand rising to 1600 feet.

Vian'na, a seaport of Portugal, at the Lima's mouth, 45 miles N. of Oporto by rail; pop. 10,000.

Viareggio (Veeared'jo), an Italian health-resort on the Mediterranean, 15 miles NW. of Pisa by rail. Pop. 17,190.

Viat'ka. See VYATKA.

Viborg (i as ee), capital of a division of Finland, at the head of an inlet from the Gulf of Finland, 75 miles NW. of St Petersburg, with Transund, 8 miles distant, for its port. Pop. 53,000.—The Danish Viborg, 45 miles NW. of Aarhuus, has but 11,000.

Vicenza (Vee-chent'za; anc. Vicentia), an Italian city surrounded by a moat and half-ruined walls, 42 miles W. of Venice by rail. In the Piazza dei Signori, a remarkably fine square, is a slender campanile, 270 feet high. Palladio was a native; and Vicenza owes to him many fine buildings, as the prefect's palace. The Gothic Duomo was built in the 13th c. Silk, linen, earthenware, paper, and velvet are manufactured. Pop. 54,800.

Vich, or VIQUE (Veetch or Veekay), a Spanish city, 40 miles N. of Barcelona. Pop. 12,600.

Vichy (Vee-shee'), a town in the heart of France, dep. Allier, on the river Allier, 30 miles SSE. of Moulins by rail. It is the most frequented bathing-resort in France. The alkaline, acidulous springs (54°–113° F.) which rise at the foot of the volcanic mountains of Auvergne, are used both for drinking and bathing. Millions of bottles of Vichy water are exported annually. Its virtues were known in Roman times, as is testified by the remains of marble baths; its modern repute it owes to Napoleon III. Now this town of about 15,000 inhabitants is visited yearly by 20,000 to 30,000 persons. See a work by Cormack (1887).

Vicksburg, the largest city of Mississippi, stands on a high, uneven bluff above the Mississippi River, 235 miles NNW. of New Orleans. Cotton is shipped, and railroad cars and iron are manufactured. The place was strongly fortified by the Confederates, but after a nine weeks' siege by land and water, surrendered on 4th July 1864, with nearly 30,000 men. Pop. 21,000.

Victoria, the smallest state, after Tasmania, in the Australian Commonwealth. It was sighted by Captain Cook in 1770, and the harbour of Port Phillip was discovered in 1801; but it was not permanently colonised till 1835. Port Phillip was administered from Sydney from 1836 till 1851, when it was constituted the colony of Victoria. Victoria occupies the south-east of Australia (separated from New South Wales by the Murray River), and has an extreme length from E. to W. of 420 miles, while its greatest breadth is only 250; its coast-line is 600 miles, and its area 87,884 sq. m. (almost exactly the same as England, Wales, and Scotland). Gold was discovered in 1851, and attracted many immigrants; the first railway was opened in 1854; and responsible government was introduced in 1857. A chain of varying height, the Dividing Range, traverses the greater portion of the colony from E. to W. 60 to 80 miles from the coast; the eastern portion, termed the Australian Alps (with peaks touching 6500 feet), divides the watershed of the Murray from Gippsland. Most of the rivers rise here; those on the north find their way into the Murray, which has a total length, including bends, of 1300 miles, 980 of which form the northern boundary of the colony. The principal streams flowing north are the Mitta Mitta, 175 miles long; Ovens, 140; Goulburn, 345; Loddon, 225; Avoca, 163; and Wimmera, 228; the last mentioned losing itself in Lake Hindmarsh. The chief of the southern streams are the Snowy, Glenelg, Yarra, and Latrobe. Many of these rivers are in the summer season mere chains of water-holes, and only the Murray and Yarra are navigable. The principal lakes are Victoria (45 sq. m.) and Wellington (54) in Gippsland, Corangamite (90; salt), in the Western District, and Hindmarsh (47; brackish) and Tyrrell (66; salt), in the Wimmera or NW. District.

The greater portion of Victoria was in its natural state an open forest, but in the W. there were large plains, and a portion of the extreme NW. is covered with a dense scrub of dwarf eucalyptus (mallee). At Melbourne the maximum temperature is 105°, minimum 30°, mean 57° 3′, and the average annual rainfall is 25·26 inches. North of the Dividing Range the temperature is rather higher and the rainfall rather less. Most of the gold-fields are in the central districts. Gold was first worked at Clunes, Ballarat, Forest Creek, and Bendigo. Originally the workings were shallow and alluvial, but most of the gold is now obtained from quartz reefs (some being 2500 feet deep). The total yield of gold up to 1910 was about 72,000,000 oz. (value £287,525,000), more than half the produce of all Australia. Antimony, tin, and gypsum are also raised, and silver is extracted from the gold at Melbourne Mint; and brown coal is abundant. There are more than 13,000,000 sheep, and 1,600,000 cattle. The chief crop is wheat; the other cereals are grown, with potatoes, hops, and tobacco; and of late much wine, brandy, grapes, raisins, and tobacco are produced. All the English fruits grow in Victoria, besides those of southern Europe. There are over 3000 miles of railway, in five systems, which connect with Adelaide and Sydney. The value of total imports in 1906–10 fluctuated between £16,000,000 and £20,000,000; that of exports between £14,000,000 and £18,200,000 (including in order gold, wool, live-stock, cereals, butter, hides, and meat). The exports to Britain average above £6,000,000 annually; the imports thence range from £4,700,000 to near £8,000,000. The revenue, over 8 millions in 1891, had decreased, owing to a commercial crisis, to about 6 millions during 1893–98, but by 1912 had recovered to about 10 millions; the expenditure being a little less. The debt, incurred for public works, was upwards of £60,700,000.

Apart from its share in the government of the Commonwealth, the state has an executive government in the hands of a governor chosen by the sovereign, assisted by a ministry appointed by the governor, but responsible to the legislature. The legislative council consists of 34 members, who must possess, and are elected by persons who enjoy, a property, professional, or academic qualification; and a legislative assembly of 65, who have no qualification, and are elected practically by universal suffrage of all male and female adult residents of British nationality. Members of the legislative assembly receive a salary of £300 per annum. The state is divided into counties, but for purposes of administration it consists of urban municipalities, called cities, towns, or boroughs, and rural municipalities or shires. Educational establishments comprise the Melbourne University, with affiliated Anglican, Presbyterian, and Wesleyan colleges; technical schools and colleges, including schools of mines; an agricultural college, and working-men's college; and primary education is free, secular, and compulsory. There is no state church. The Anglican Church has an archbishop and four bishops, and the R. C. Church has an archbishop and three bishops. Episcopalians nearly equal in number Catholics and Presbyterians together. The pop. at the census of 1911 was 1,315,000—98 per cent. British subjects by birth. The Chinese have decreased to about 6000; the aborigines, 600 or 700 in number, show signs of increasing. In 1906-11 the annual immigration increased from 70,000 to 102,000, but was in some years nearly balanced by emigration. Three-fifths of the pop. live in towns—Melbourne, the capital (with two-fifths of the total pop.), Ballarat, Sandhurst, Geelong, &c. See AUSTRALIA and books there cited, and works on Victoria by Labillière (1878), J. Smith (1903), Turner (1904), and Gregory (1907).

Victoria Nyanza (y consonantal), a great fresh-water lake in East Central Africa, situated on the Equator, and on the meridian of 33° E., lies 3820 feet above sea-level, and has an area of over 30,000 sq. m., or about the size of Ireland. The water is good and fresh, although somewhat insipid, and often dirty white. The lake is drained by the Nile, and its chief feeders are the Kagera, the Nzoia, the Nyando, and the Katonga. Seiches have been noticed, the rise lasting from 30 to 60 minutes. The lake, whose native name is Ukerewe, was discovered by Speke in 1858, visited by him and Grant in 1861-62, and subsequently explored by Stanley (1875), Mackay, Thomson, &c.

Vien'na (Ger. Wien; pron. Veen), the capital of the Austrian empire, and (jointly with Budapest) of the dual monarchy, is situated in Lower Austria, on the Danube Canal, a south branch of the Danube, here joined by the small river Wien. Vienna proper consists of the Inner City and ten suburban districts surrounding it, formerly encircled by fortifications known as the Lines, which in 1892 were replaced by a boulevard (Gürtelstrasse). Nine populous suburbs beyond the Lines and one on the left bank of the Danube were added (1890-1905) to the Vienna police-district, which has a total area of 74 sq. m., and pop. (1910) of 2,030,850. The irregular hexagon formed by the Inner City was until 1858 enclosed by an inner line of fortifications, the site of which is now occupied by the Ringstrasse, a series of handsome boulevards. Though Vienna contains buildings of the 14th and even of the 13th century, it is, in its present form, essentially a modern city. The Inner City and the Ringstrasse are the handsomest and most fashionable quarters. In the former are the cathedral of St Stephen (1300-1510), with a steeple 450 feet high; the Hofburg or imperial palace, a large and irregular pile of very various dates; and many palaces of the nobility. On one side or other of the Ringstrasse rise the Exchange; the University (1874-84); the huge Gothic Rathhaus (1873-83); the Parliament House; the Supreme Law Courts; the Imperial Museums of Natural History and of Art (1872-86), twin buildings on either side of the imposing monument of the Empress Maria Theresa (unveiled 1888); the imperial Opera-house; the Academy of Art; the Austrian Museum of Art and Industry, &c. In other parts of the city are the Arsenal; the Josephinum, a medical college founded in 1784; and the Votive Church, an admirable specimen of modern Gothic, built in 1856-79 to commemorate the emperor's escape from assassination in 1853. Vienna is well provided with public parks, the largest being the Prater (7 sq. m.), one of the finest parks in Europe, opened in 1766. The university, founded in 1365 and renowned throughout the world as a medical school, has a teaching-staff of 500 and some 10,000 students. The magnificent public picture-gallery, now in the Museum of Art, is specially famous for its unrivalled examples of the Venetian school, Rubens, and Dürer. The Public Hospital, with 2000 beds, is perhaps the largest hospital in Europe. Vienna is the chief industrial city in the empire. Machinery, scientific and musical instruments, artistic goods in bronze, leather, terra-cotta, porcelain, &c., furniture, meerschaum-pipes, &c. are among the noted manufactures. As a centre of trade and finance Vienna is no less important. Over 2½ million pounds were spent in 1868-81 in regulating the channel of the Danube.

The Roman Vindobona was established in 14 A.D. as the successor of the Celtic Vindomina. Its present importance dates only from the Crusades. In 1276 it became the capital of the Hapsburg dynasty. The Turks besieged Vienna from July 14 to September 12, 1683, when John Sobieski of Poland relieved it. Treaties have been concluded here in 1738, 1864, and 1866. The Congress of Vienna (1814-15) re-arranged the map of Europe, disturbed by the French Revolution and Napoleon, somewhat on the old lines.

Vienne, a dep. of W. France, formed mainly out of Poitou. Area, 2691 sq. m.; pop. (1881) 340,295; (1911) 332,276. The Vienne, an affluent of the Loire, is the chief river. The arrondissements are Poitiers (the capital), Châtellerault, Civray, Loudun, Montmorillon.

Vienne (Vee-enn'), a town in the French dep. of Isère (far away from that of Vienne), on the Rhone's left bank, 19 miles S. of Lyons by rail, where the Gère joins the Rhone. Vienne was the chief town of the Allobroges, and in the time of the Roman empire the rival of Lyons. Besides water-conduits, &c., of Roman construction, there are a Corinthian temple, remains of a theatre, and an obelisk, called L'Aiguille, 72 feet high. The archiepiscopal cathedral was built in 1107–1251; St Peter's dates from the 6th c. In a council held here (1312) Pope Clement V. suppressed the Templars. Vienne manufactures woollens, silk, paper, leather, and iron goods. Pop. 23,000.

Vienne, Haute, a French dep. SE. of Vienne. Area, 2130 sq. m.; pop. (1872) 322,447; (1911) 384,736. The arrondissements are Limoges (the capital), Bellac, Rochechouart, and Saint-Yrieix.

Vire (Veer), a town in the Norman dep. Calvados, on the Vire, 35 miles SW. of Caen. Pop. 6635.

Virgin'ia, a middle Atlantic state of the American Union, separated from Maryland by the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay, and bounded S. by North Carolina and Tennessee, W. and NW. by Kentucky and West Virginia. Its greatest length from E. to W. is 475 miles; its greatest width 190 miles; and its land area 40,125 sq. m., with a water area of 2325. The surface consists of a series of belts parallel to the coast on the E. and the Appalachian Mountains on the W. The fifth and highest of these belts, styled 'Appalachia,' is a series of long narrow valleys 2000 feet or more above the sea, enclosed between the ranges of the Alleghany Mountains. The chief rivers are the Potomac, Rappahannock, York, James, Blackwater, and Roanoke. A seventh of the state is drained by the Kanawha or New River, Holston, and Clinch, which feed the Ohio. Virginia is famous for its mineral springs, and has its Natural Bridge, in Rockbridge county, and many caverns. Except on the swampy coast the climate is pleasant and healthful. The soils are mostly fertile, and the state contains extensive forests. Waterfowl, partridges or quails, pigeons, grouse, wild turkeys, and deer are plentiful. The fisheries supply large quantities of fish; oyster-culture is important. Indian corn, oats, and barley are extensively grown. Tobacco has always been a staple crop, and the 'Virginia leaf' is noted throughout the world. Among the mineral products are building stones, iron, lead, and zinc ores, gold (once largely worked), and bituminous and anthracite coal. Virginia has 100 counties and eighteen cities independent of county government. The chief cities are Richmond (the capital), Norfolk, Petersburg, Roanoke, Newport News, Lynchburg, Portsmouth, Danville, and Alexandria. The history of Virginia is specially romantic and heroic. It was here that the first lasting colony was established in 1607 by the English. At Jamestown was held the first representative assembly in America. With its early period are associated the names of Captain John Smith and Pocahontas. Such was the prosperity of the colony that at the end of the colonial period Virginia was the most populous and wealthy of the thirteen colonies. In the protest against the Stamp Act and the encroachments of Great Britain Virginia took the lead, and in the revolutionary struggle furnished such noted sons as Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, the Lees, and Madison. At Yorktown Cornwallis's surrender put an end to the contest. In the civil war Virginia furnished the Confederate commander, Robert E. Lee, and on its soil the last battle was fought and the final surrender made. Of the first twenty-one presidents seven were Virginians. Pop. (1800) 880,200; (1860) 1,596,318; (1870, after the separation of West Virginia) 1,225,163; (1880) 1,512,565; (1900)

Wakefield, the capital of the West Riding of Yorkshire, stands on the Calder at a convergence of railways, 9 miles SSE. of Leeds, 27 SSW. of York, and 19 NW. of Doncaster. In 1888 it was constituted the seat of a bishopric—its cathedral the fine Perpendicular parish church, which, enlarged and reconsecrated in 1329, and again enlarged about 1470, was restored in 1857–86 from designs by Sir G. G. Scott at a cost of £30,000, and has a tower and spire 247 feet high. On the nine-arch bridge over the Calder is a beautiful Decorated chapel (1357); it also was restored in 1847. At the grammar-school, chartered in 1591, and removed to new buildings in 1855, were educated Dr Radcliffe, Archbishop Potter, the Benedictine Cressy, and Bentley, the first two natives. The town-hall, French Renaissance in style, was erected in 1880 at a cost of £72,000; and other buildings are the corn exchange, fine art institute, Clayton hospital, and lunatic asylum. Though not the great 'clothing town' it was formerly, Wakefield still manufactures woollens, worsteds, and hosiery, as also agricultural implements, machinery, &c. It was incorporated in 1848, and made a parliamentary borough in 1832. Pop. (1851) 22,065; (1881) 33,240; (1911) 51,511. Here the Yorkists were defeated in 1460.

Waldeck (w as v), or Waldeck-Pyrmont, a small German principality controlled since 1867 by Prussia, consists of two parts, Waldeck, between Westphalia and Hesse-Nassau, and Pyrmont, a patch between Lippe, Westphalia, Brunswick, and Hanover. The country is high-lying and poor. Total area, 438 sq. m.; population, 62,000—10,000 in Pyrmont. The capital is Arolsen (q.v.). Pyrmont, 15 miles E. of Detmold (pop. 1500), has famous mineral springs.

Waldenburg, a town of Silesia, 43 miles SW. of Breslau. Pop. 16,300.

Wales, a great peninsula in the west of the island of Britain, bounded by the Irish Sea, St George's Channel, and the Bristol Channel, and touching the (now English) counties of Cheshire, Shropshire, Hereford, and Monmouth (q.v.). The area is 7363 sq. m., about a fifth larger than Yorkshire. The principality of Wales, administratively a part of England, though differing more or less widely in blood, language, national character, and religious temper, is a mountainous land, and contains Snowdon (q.v.), the highest point in South Britain; North Wales is especially picturesque. The minerals are extremely valuable, and South Wales contains some of the most important coal and iron industries in the United Kingdom. Copper, zinc, lead, tin, and gold are also found. The physical geography, geology, climate, &c. are dealt with at Great Britain. The Anglican Church has four episcopal sees; its disestablishment in 1912–14 was hotly disputed. Calvinistic Methodists, Congregationalists, Baptists, and Wesleyans are very numerous, and claim to be a large majority of the total population. There are university colleges at Aberystwith, Bangor, and Cardiff, and theological colleges at Lampeter, &c. A Welsh university for the affiliation of the three university colleges was created in 1894. There is a National Library at Cardiff. See the articles on the several Welsh counties, and on the towns, Cardiff, Swansea, &c. The following table shows the area and population of the twelve Welsh counties at the censuses of 1901 and 1911: In 1901 278,892 persons were set down as speaking Welsh only, 615,242 as speaking both Welsh and English; so that 894,134 (50·8 per cent.—as against 70 per cent. in 1881) did or could speak Welsh.

Walfish. See Walvisch.

Walham Green, a district of Middlesex, 6 miles WSW. of St Paul's.

Walker, a town of Northumberland, incorporated with Newcastle in 1904.

Walkerburn, a Peeblesshire village, with woollen factories, on the Tweed, 1¾ mile E. by N. of Innerleithen. Pop. 1300.

Walla'chia. See Roumania.

Wallasey, a Cheshire township, 3½ miles NNW. of Birkenhead.

Walla Walla, capital of a county in Washington, on the Walla Walla River, 204 miles SSW. of Spokane Falls. Pop. 20,000.

Wallingford, a town of Berkshire, 15 miles NW. of Reading and 13 SSE. of Oxford, on the right bank of the Thames, which is crossed here by a bridge 300 yards long, built in 1809 at a cost of £14,000. It has Roman earthworks, a fragment of a Norman castle, which figured prominently in King Stephen's wars, and was taken by Fairfax and dismantled (1646); three—formerly thirteen—churches, in one of which Blackstone is buried; a grammar-school; a short branch-line; and a great July wool sale. A borough since Edward the Confessor's time, it returned two members till 1832, and then one till 1885. Pop. 2700. See works by Crofts (1870) and Hedges (2 vols. 1882).

Wallingford, a borough of Connecticut, on the Quinepiac River, 13 miles by rail NNE. of New Haven, with manufactories of buttons and Britannia and silver ware. Pop. 11,200.

Wallsend', a mun. bor. (1907) of Northumberland noted for its collieries, 4 miles NE. of Newcastle. It is named from its being at the end of Hadrian's Wall (q.v.); and many Roman relics have been found here. Pop. 41,500.

Walmer Castle, in Kent, 2 miles S. of Deal, is the official residence of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports (q.v.), and is a round-towered castle, built by Henry VIII. It was the favourite residence and the death-place of the Duke of Wellington; and its relics of him, of Pitt, and of other Lord Wardens were in 1892 secured to the nation by the son of the late Right Hon. W. H. Smith. The adjoining town of Walmer is a favourite watering-place, has barracks, and is a member of the Cinque Port of Sandwich. Pop. 5350. See Elvin's Records of Walmer (1894).

Walsall (Waul'saul), a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough of Staffordshire, is situated on an eminence above a small feeder of the Tame, 8 miles NNW. of Birmingham, 6 E. of Wolverhampton, and 123 NW. of London. An ancient place, but of modern development, it stands on the edge of the South Staffordshire coalfield, and manufactures saddlers' ironmongery and all kinds of saddlery, carriages, iron and brass, leather, &c., whilst in the vicinity are coal-pits, limestone-quarries, and brickyards. The public buildings include an Italian Renaissance guildhall (1867), county court-house (1869), post-office (1879), public library (1859), grammar-school (1554; rebuilt 1850), and cottage hospital (1878); and in 1886 a statue was erected of 'Sister Dora' (Miss Pattison). Walsall was the scene in 1891–92 of an Anarchist conspiracy, for which four dynamiters were convicted. It became a municipal borough in Henry IV.'s reign; a parliamentary borough, returning one member, in 1832; and a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1851) 25,680; (1881) 54,402; (1911) 92,115. See Willmore's History of Walsall (1887).

Wal'sham, North, a market-town of Norfolk, 14 miles N. by E. of Norwich. It has a large Perpendicular church with a ruined tower, and a market-cross (rebuilt 1600). Pop. 4500.

Wal'singham, a small town of one long street and 1000 inhabitants in the north of Norfolk, 5 miles N. by E. of Fakenham. The ruined Augustinian priory (1016) contained a famous image of 'Our Lady of Walsingham.' Henry VIII. made the pilgrimage to it barefoot, and Erasmus' Peregrinatio religionis ergo records his own visit.

Walsoken, a NE. suburb of Wisbeach.

Wal'tham, a market-town of Essex, on the Lea, 13 miles N. by E. of London. Called also Waltham Abbey and Waltham Holy Cross, it retains the nave of a stately Norman church, which, rebuilt by Harold in 1060 for a collegiate chapter, served from 1177 for an Augustinian abbey. A miraculous cross had been brought here from Montacute in Somerset; and here probably Harold was buried. Both the nave and a Decorated lady chapel have been restored; they serve for the parish church, of which Bishop Hall and Thomas Fuller were incumbents. Waltham has memories also of Cranmer and Henry VIII. Waltham Cross, erected by Edward I. in 1290 in memory of Queen Eleanor, and restored in 1890, is 1¼ mile W., in Hertfordshire; and 1 mile farther W. is Theobalds (q.v.). The Lea's many channels form a network of islands, on which are vast government powder-mills. Enfield (q.v.), in Middlesex, is also near, and market-gardening is largely carried on. The population is 6800. See works by Fuller (1655; ed. by Nichols, 1837) and Bishop Stubbs (1860).

Waltham, a town of Massachusetts, on the Charles River, 10 miles by rail WNW. of Boston, with manufactories of watches. Pop. (1880) 11,712; (1910) 27,834.

Wal'thamstow, an Essex urban district, 6 miles NE. of St Paul's. William Morris, the poet, was born here. Pop. 125,000.

Walton-on-Thames, a Surrey village, 17 miles (by water 28) SW. of London. Its church has some interesting monuments, and Lilly, the astrologer, is buried here. Pop. 13,000.

Walton-on-the-Naze, an Essex watering-place, 7 miles S. of Harwich. Pop. 2200.

Walvisch Bay (Dutch, 'Bay of Whales'), anglicised as Walfish or Walwich Bay, a territory of 480 sq. m. on the W. coast of Africa, 420 miles N. of the Orange River's mouth. Declared British in 1878, and annexed to the Cape in 1884, it is surrounded by German Damaraland. The bay affords a safe anchorage. Pop. 1000.

Wandsbeck, a NE. suburb of Hamburg.

Wandsworth, a metropolitan borough of the county of London. Pop. 311,000.

Wanganui (Wahng-a-noo'ee), a port of New Zealand, 135 miles NW. of Wellington; pop. 12,000.

Wanks. See Honduras.

Wanlockhead, a mining village of Dumfriesshire, 8½ miles ENE. of Sanquhar. Pop. 600.

Wansbeck. See Morpeth.

Wanstead, an Essex urban district, 7 miles NE. of London. Pop. 15,000.

Wan'tage, an urban district of Berkshire, in the Vale of the White Horse, 26 miles W. of Reading. A steam tramway (1875), the first in England, and 2½ miles long, connects it with Wantage Road station; and it has a good 14th-century church, a corn exchange (1865), a grammar-school (1597; rebuilt 1850), an Anglican home for penitents, and a marble statue (1877) of King Alfred, who was born here, by Count Gleichen. Bishop Butler was also a native. Wantage manufactures farm implements. Pop. 3600.

Wantsome. See Thanet.

Wapping, a Thames-side parish of E. London.

Warasdin (Varasdeen'), a cathedral city in Croatia, on the Drave's right bank, 35 miles NE. of Agram. Pop. 13,700. Warasdin-Töplitza warm sulphurous spring is 7 miles SW.

Wardour Castle (a as o), Wiltshire, 15 miles W. of Salisbury, the Grecian mansion (1789) of Lord Arundell of Wardour.

Ware, a market-town of Herts, on the Lea, 2½ miles ENE. of Hertford. It has a fine cruciform church, remains of a priory (1233), great malting establishments, and memories of Godwin and 'John Gilpin.' St Edmund's Catholic College (1769), with a chapel of 1850 by Pugin, is at Old Hall Green, 5 miles NNE.; and the Great Bed of Ware was in 1869 removed to Rye House. Pop. (1851) 4882; (1911) 5842. See, for the college, a work by the Very Rev. B. Ward (1893).

Ware, a town of Massachusetts, on Ware River, 74 miles by rail W. of Boston, with cotton and woollen factories. Pop. 10,000.

Wareham, a small but very ancient market-town of Dorsetshire, stands between the rivers Piddle and Frome, 15 miles E. of Dorchester. It was a British town, and afterwards a Roman station, and is surrounded by a grassy vallum, still 30 feet high and perfect on three sides. A fire destroyed two-thirds of Wareham in 1762, and a Norman castle and a priory have disappeared; but St Mary's church retains an interesting chapel, that marks the resting-place for two years of Edward the Martyr. Superseded by Poole as a port, Wareham now depends chiefly on extensive clay-works. It is a municipal borough (incorporated 1886), and till 1832 returned two members, then till 1885 one (with Corfe Castle, Arne, &c.). Horace Walpole is claimed falsely as a native. Pop. 2000.

Wark Castle, a Northumberland ruin, on the Tweed, 2½ miles W. by S. of Cornhill.

Warkworth (Waurk'worth), a small seaport (pop. 700) in Northumberland, near the mouth of the Coquet, 7 miles SE. of Alnwick by rail. The Percies' castle, mostly ruinous, dates from the 12th c. The Norman church has been restored. The Benedictine priory was founded in 1256, and the hermitage of Bishop Percy's ballad is a mile above the castle.

Warminster, a town of Wilts, 19½ miles NW. of Salisbury, with a free school (1707) and a theological college (1860). Pop. 5500.

Warnemünde, a port of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 7 miles NNW. of Rostock, of which it is the outport, with a train ferry on the Berlin-Copenhagen route. Pop. 5000.

Warnsdorf, a manufacturing town in the north of Bohemia, 60 miles N. of Prague. Pop. 25,000.

Warren, (1) capital of Trumbull county, Ohio, 52 miles SE. of Cleveland, with rolling and flour mills, and manufactories of linseed-oil, cottons, &c. Pop. 11,000.—(2) Capital of Warren county, Pennsylvania, on the Alleghany River, 66 miles SE. of Erie. It manufactures engines, boilers, wooden wares, and leather. Pop. 11,000.

Warrenpoint, a Down port, at the head of Carlingford Lough, 83 miles N. of Dublin. Pop. 2000.

Warrington (a as o), a municipal and parliamentary borough and manufacturing town of Lancashire, on the Mersey's right bank, 18 miles E. of Liverpool, 16 WSW. of Manchester, and 182 NW. of London. Though of recent development, it is an ancient place, the Wallintun of Domesday; and, acquiring strategic importance through its bridge (1496) over the Mersey, it was the scene of defeats of the Scots (1648), the royalists (1651), and a portion of Prince Charles Edward's forces (1745). To a dissenting academy, founded in 1757, it owes its memories of Drs Aikin, Priestley, Taylor, &c.; and Lucy Aikin was a native. There are still some old timbered houses; and the parish church, St Elphin's, with a spire 300 feet high, is a fine cruciform Decorated structure, restored in 1859-67 at a cost of over £15,000. The town-hall was the former seat (1750) of Col. Wilson Patten, purchased in 1872 for £20,000; and other buildings are the Royal Court Theatre (1862), post-office (1876), hospital (1876), museum and library (1857), school of art (1882), public baths (1866), grammar-school (1526; rebuilt 1857), &c. There are also public gardens and a park. The manufactures include iron, wire, pins, files, cottons, glass, leather, and soap. Warrington was constituted a parliamentary borough, returning one member, in 1832, a municipal borough in 1847, and became a county borough under the Act of 1888. Pop. (1851) 22,894; (1901) 64,242; (1911) 72,166.

Warrnambool, a seaport of Victoria, 166 miles SW. of Melbourne. Pop. 7000.

Warsaw (Polish Warszawa), long the capital of Poland and now capital of a government of Russian Poland, stands on the Vistula's left bank, 330 miles E. of Berlin by rail and 700 SW. of St Petersburg. Two iron bridges lead to the suburb of Praga, on the opposite bank. Standing on a navigable river, with great railway lines to Moscow, St Petersburg, Vienna, Danzig, and Berlin, Warsaw is one of the most important cities of eastern Europe, being smaller only than St Petersburg and Moscow. Corn and flax are largely exported, and coal and manufactured goods imported. Warsaw itself manufactures electroplate, machinery, boots, woollens, pianos, carriages, tobacco, sugar, chemicals, beer, and spirits. Of over one hundred Catholic churches the cathedral of St John is the most notable; there are also six Greek churches, two Lutheran ones, and many synagogues. The castle is an imposing building, and there are many fine private palaces. The university, suppressed in 1832, was reopened in 1864, and has seventy-five professors (who teach in Russian) and over 1100 students. Pop. (1872) 276,000; (1910) 855,900.—Area of government, 6750 sq. m.; pop. 2,500,000.

Warsop, a town of Notts, 5 miles NNE. of Mansfield. Pop. 4200.

Wartburg (Vahrt'boorg). See EISENACH.

Warthe (Var'teh), the Oder's chief affluent, rises on the SW. frontier of Poland, flows N. and W. into Prussia, then N. (past Posen) and W. again, and enters the Oder at Küstrin. Length, 445 miles (230 in Prussia, and 265 navigable).

Warwick (Wor'rick), the county town of Warwickshire, on the Avon, 21 miles SE. of Birmingham, 45 NNW. of Oxford, and 107 NW. of London. In spite of a great fire in 1694, it has preserved much of its mediæval character, and, besides a good deal of antique domestic architecture, retains two of the old gates with chapels above their archways. St Mary's church is a large cruciform structure, largely rebuilt after that great fire, with a Norman crypt, the superb Beauchamp chapel (1464), and a wealth of interesting monuments. But Warwick's chief glory is its stately castle, on a rocky elevation, 40 feet high, overhanging the river. Ethelfleda, King Alfred's daughter, built a fortress here about 915; but the present edifice, which extends over 3 acres, is all of post-Conquest erection, its oldest portion the huge Cæsar's Tower (147 feet high), whilst Guy's Tower (128 feet) was built in 1394. Having passed ere then, with the earldom of Warwick, to the Beauchamps, Nevilles, Plantagenets, Dudleys, and Riches, it had long been ruinous when in 1605 it was granted to Sir Fulke Greville, whose descendant, Lord Brooke, was in 1759 created Earl of Warwick, and who spent at least £20,000 in repairing and beautifying it. It stood a memorable siege by the royalists during the Great Rebellion, and its great hall was gutted by fire on 3d December 1871; but by 1876 the damage had been repaired at a cost of £18,000, and Warwick Castle is one of the few feudal residences still tenanted. Besides relics of Guy of Warwick, the 'King-maker,' and Cromwell, it has paintings by Van Dyck, Rubens, Holbein, and other masters, the 'Grimani table,' valued at £10,000, and the Greek 'Warwick vase,' 7 feet in diameter, from Hadrian's Villa at Tivoli. It has welcomed many royal visitors, as Queen Elizabeth, James I., William III., and (in 1892) the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York. The Leycester Hospital was founded in 1571 by Robert Dudley, Queen Elizabeth's favourite, for twelve poor brethren; the king's school (1546) occupies fine modern buildings erected at a cost of over £13,000. The manufactures include art furniture, gelatine, and agricultural implements. Landor was born here. Warwick, which was chartered by Henry VIII. as a municipal borough, lost one of its two members in 1885, when the parliamentary boundary was extended so as to take in Leamington (q.v.), the borough being called that of Warwick and Leamington. Pop. of mun. borough (1851) 10,973; (1911) 11,858; of parl. borough (1911) 38,846.

Warwick, a township of Rhode Island, on Narragansett Bay, 10 miles SW. of Providence. Pop. 26,000.

Warwickshire, a west midland county of England, bounded by the counties of Stafford, Derby, Leicester, Northampton, Oxford, Gloucester, and Worcester. It has an extreme length from N. to S. of 52 miles, an extreme breadth of 33 miles, and an area of 946 sq. m., or 605,275 acres. In the south are spurs of the Coteswolds, as the Edge Hills (826 feet); but elsewhere the surface is varied only by gentle undulations, formerly covered by the Forest of Arden. The Avon, flowing south-westward towards the Severn, is the principal river; but in the north is the Tame, a tributary of the Trent. A coal-field, 16 miles by 3, extends from near Coventry to the Staffordshire boundary east of Tamworth; and Warwickshire also produces some fireclay, ironstone, limestone, &c. About seven-eighths of the total area is in crops and permanent pasture; woods and plantations occupy nearly 21,000 acres. The great industries are noticed under Birmingham and Coventry; other towns are Warwick, Rugby, Leamington, Stratford-on-Avon, and Nuneaton. The county, which comprises four hundreds, 259 civil parishes, two county boroughs, and four parliamentary divisions, is mainly in the diocese of Worcester. The antiquities include a stone circle (the 'Rollright Stones'), Roman stations and roads, and a wealth of mediæval remains, as Warwick and Kenilworth castles. The battlefield of Edgehill must also be noticed; whilst of Warwickshire worthies may be mentioned Shakespeare, Baskerville, Samuel Butler, David Cox, Drayton, Dugdale, 'George Eliot,' Landor, Dr Parr, and Priestley. Pop. (1801) 206,798; (1841) 401,703; (1901) 897,678; (1911) 1,247,418. See Dugdale's Warwickshire (1656; new ed. 1730), histories by W. Smith (1830), West (1830), Burgess (1876 and 1893), Timmins (1889), and the 'Victoria History' (1905–8).

Wash, a wide estuary on the east coast of England, between the counties of Lincoln and Norfolk, is 22 miles in length and 15 in average breadth. With low and marshy shores, it is largely occupied by sandbanks, dry at low water, and receives the rivers Witham, Welland, Ouse, Nen, and Nar. On both sides of the Ouse's channel much land has been reclaimed; and a proposal of Rennie's to drain the Wash, and so reclaim 150,000 acres, was revived in 1893.

Wash′ington, the most north-western state of the American Union, is bounded by British Columbia, Idaho, Oregon, and the Pacific. It is 350 miles long (E. to W.), 200 miles wide, and 69,180 sq. m. in area. The Cascade Range (q.v.) traverses the state from N. to S. The summits of several of the volcanic cones are covered with perpetual snow, and their glaciers rival in beauty those of Switzerland. Western Washington is mountainous, interspersed with fertile valleys. The Coast Range to the west of the Cascades extends in broken masses from the S. to the Strait of Juan de Fuca. This strait and the great inland sea of Puget Sound afford some of the best harbours in the world. Central Washington, between the Cascade Range and the Columbia River, is a lofty plateau region, its surface, like that of Eastern Washington, largely covered with lava, and carved into deep and picturesque cañons by the tributaries of the Columbia. East of the Columbia the plateaus and plains are cut by the valleys of Clark's Fork and the Spokane and Snake rivers. The whole of Eastern and a portion of Western Washington are drained by the Columbia River, which for nearly 300 miles forms the boundary with Oregon. In Western Washington the winters are very mild, and the rainfall is the heaviest in the United States. Western Washington is heavily wooded, and lumbering a leading pursuit. Portions of Central and Eastern Washington are well adapted for wheat-growing and grazing. There are extensive coalfields around Puget Sound. The coast fisheries and the salmon-canneries on the Columbia are valuable. Washington was organised as a territory in 1853, reduced to its present limits in 1863, and admitted as a state in 1889. Towns are Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane, Walla Walla, and Olympia (the capital). Pop. (1870) 23,955; (1900) 518,103; (1910) 1,141,990.

Washington, name of over 200 cities, towns, townships, villages, and hamlets in the United States: (1) the capital of Daviess county, Indiana, 173 miles W. of Cincinnati, with coal-mines near by; pop. 8000.—(2) the capital of Fayette county, Ohio, 77 miles ENE. of Cincinnati; pop. 7300.—(3) the capital of Washington county, Pennsylvania, 31 miles SW. of Pittsburgh, with many mills and cigar-factories, coal-mines, and the Washington and Jefferson College (Presbyterian; founded 1802). Pop. 19,000.

Washington City, the capital of the United States, in the District of Columbia (q.v.), on the Potomac River, in 38° 53′ lat., 77° 2′ long., 226 miles SSW. of New York, 136 of Philadelphia, and 40 of Baltimore. More than half the area of the city proper is permanently free from the encroachment of buildings; and besides the numerous small parks, Washington has a zoological park of 140 acres, and the Rock Creek Park of over 1500 (purchased in 1892 for $1,200,000). Streets and avenues are thickly planted with shade-trees. The architecture of the older city is commonplace, but in the newer Washington is of striking variety and attractiveness. The government buildings are mostly fine and imposing structures. Conspicuous on an eminence is the Capitol, built in 1818–59 at a cost of $14,000,000, and 751 feet long; its iron dome, crowned by a bronze figure of Liberty, is 285 feet high. The hall of the House of Representatives has desks for 356 members, and the galleries seat 1500 spectators. The Senate Chamber accommodates 1000 spectators. The National Memorial Hall in the Capitol is to receive statues contributed by each state to commemorate two of its distinguished citizens. The Treasury Department at Pennsylvania Avenue and Fifteenth Street (of freestone and granite) cost $7,000,000. The Interior Department occupies an entire square in the heart of the city, and is constructed of white marble, in pure Doric, costing $3,000,000. The Post-office Department opposite is a Corinthian marble edifice. The granite building for the departments of state, war, and navy, in Renaissance style, is the largest public edifice in Washington, covers 4½ acres, has 566 rooms, and cost $11,000,000. The Congressional Library building, on Capitol Hill, cost $6,000,000. The president's house and executive mansion is a plain edifice of freestone, in classic style, painted white (whence called 'the White House'). The Smithsonian Institution is built of red sandstone, in the Byzantine style, with picturesque towers. The national monument to Washington (1885) is an obelisk of white marble, 555 feet high, beside the Potomac, erected at a cost of $1,230,000. The National Soldiers' Home, 2 miles above the city, founded in 1851, has 600 acres of park and forest, which serve as a public driving park and rural resort. The Columbian University (1814), Georgetown College (R. C.; 1789), the National University, and Howard University (for coloured students) have each departments of law and medicine. The Catholic University of America (1887) has fine stone buildings just outside the city limits. The Methodist American University has its grounds above Georgetown. Other buildings are the Naval Observatory, the National Deaf-mute College, and the Gonzaga (Catholic) College. The National Museum, originally established to exhibit the rich contributions given to the government by various countries from the World's Fair at Philadelphia in 1876, has become a most extensive and instructive collection of antiquities, ethnology, geology, and natural history generally; and there are many museums, libraries, art galleries, &c. Few of the 200 churches are remarkable. Hardly a public square or circle is without its monument. The city is abundantly supplied with pure water, by a conduit 15 miles long, from the Great Falls of the Potomac. The various bureaus employ between 6000 and 7000 persons. The number of hotels and boarding-houses is very great; and a steadily increasing number of people of wealth and taste are building residences at the national capital. The absence of smoky manufactories, the genial and salubrious climate, the pleasant situation and attractive suburbs, with the wide and smooth streets, contribute to render a residence in Washington agreeable during all but the torrid heats of summer. The original plan of 'the city of magnificent distances,' as it has been called, was drawn out by a resident French engineer, L'Enfant, and largely copied from Versailles. Its characteristic features are the crossing of the rectangular streets by frequent broad transverse avenues, 160 to 120 feet wide, and the numerous circles and triangular reservations interspersed as little parks throughout the city. Originally called Federal City, it was named after Washington in 1791, and became the capital in 1800. In 1814 the Capitol was burned by the British. After the civil war of 1861–65 Washington began to move forward in a new career of prosperity, and was transformed in a few years to a beautiful and attractive city. Pop. (1800) 3210; (1830) 23,364; (1880) 147,293; (1900) 218,196; (1910) 331,069.

Washita (Wosh-e-taw'), a tributary of the Red River (q.v.), noted for its whetstones.

Wast Water, Cumberland, 14 miles SSW. of Keswick, is a lake 3 miles long, ½ mile wide, 204 feet above sea-level, and 258 feet deep.

Watchet, a small Somerset seaport, on the Bristol Channel, 16½ miles NW. of Taunton.

Waterbury, a city of Connecticut, 33 miles by rail SW. of Hartford, on the Naugatuck River. It manufactures brass wares, and its cheap watches that have carried its name round the world. Pop. (1880) 17,806; (1910) 73,714.

Waterford, an Irish county of Munster, E. of Cork. Its greatest length from E. to W. is 52 miles; its breadth 28; and its area 721 sq. m., or 461,552 acres. The surface is mountainous, the chief ranges, Knockmeledown (2609 feet) and Cummeragh (2478). The Suir and Blackwater are the chief rivers. The climate is moist, and the soil much of it marshy; but the uplands are well suited for tillage, and the lower pasture-lands produce excellent butter. Lead, iron, copper, marble, and potter's clay are found. There are some cotton manufactures, and the fisheries are of some importance. The chief towns are Waterford, Dungarvan, Tramore, Portlaw, and Lismore. Before 1885 the county and the boroughs returned five members; now the county sends two and Waterford city one. Pop. (1841) 196,187; (1911) 83,966—79,000 Catholics. The county is rich in Celtic, Danish, and Anglo-Norman antiquities.

WATERFORD, the county town, itself a county of a city and a municipal and parliamentary borough, is on the river Suir, at the head of the tidal estuary, Waterford Harbour, 97 miles SSW. of Dublin by rail. The city, on the Suir's right bank, is connected with its suburb of Ferrybank by a wooden bridge of thirty-nine arches. The quay admits vessels of 2000 tons; there is a shipbuilding yard and dock on the Kilkenny bank; but the place has not a thriving look. The chief public buildings are the Protestant and R. C. cathedrals, the Protestant episcopal palace, the (Catholic) college of St John, the city and county court-houses, besides hospitals, &c. The chief trade is with England in the export of agricultural produce. Waterford is originally of Danish foundation, but in 1171 was taken by assault by Strongbow. It received a charter from John. Pop. (1881) 22,457; (1891) 21,693; and (1911) on extended area, 27,464 (of whom 25,000 were Catholics). See Ryland's History of Waterford (1824).

Waterloo (Flemish pron. Wah-ter-lō'), a Belgian town (pop. 3600), 11 miles S. of Brussels, which gives name to Wellington's decisive victory over Napoleon, fought near it on Sunday the 18th June 1815. The French numbered 72,247; the allies 69,894 (25,389 British); and the loss of the former was 32,000 (including prisoners), of the latter 22,500. By Frenchmen the battle is named after the village of Mont St Jean; by Prussians, after the farm of La Belle Alliance. See Ropes's The Campaign of Waterloo (1893).

Waterloo, a town of Iowa, on the Cedar River, 93 miles W. of Dubuque. Pop. 26,000.

Waterloo-with-Seaforth, a Lancashire watering-place, 4 miles N. by W. of Liverpool. Pop. 27,000.

Watertown, (1) a town of Massachusetts, on the Charles River, 8 miles W. of Boston, with a national arsenal. Pop. 13,000.—(2) Capital of Jefferson county, New York, on Black River, 12 miles by rail E. of Sackett's Harbour, on Lake Ontario. The rapids supply power for factories of spring-wagons, sewing-machines, paper, woollens, &c. Pop. 27,000.—(3) A city of Wisconsin, on Rock River, 44 miles W. by N. of Milwaukee, with manufactories of flour, beer, chairs, blinds, &c., and a Lutheran university (1864). Pop. 9000.

Waterville, a village of Maine, on the Kennebec, 19 miles N. by E. of Augusta. Pop. 9480.

Watervliet (formerly West Troy), a city of New York, on the left bank of the Hudson River, opposite Troy. It has a U.S. arsenal. Pop. 15,500.

Watford (a as o), a market-town of Hertfordshire, on the Colne, 15 miles (by rail 18) NW. of London. The Perpendicular church, restored in 1871, contains some interesting monuments of the Morrisons and Cassells, Earls of Essex, whose seat, Cassiobury, is close to the town; and there are also the London Orphan Asylum (inst. 1813; transferred hither, 1871), the Salters' Company's almshouses (1873), the endowed schools (1874), the public library and school of art (1874), &c., besides manufactures of silk and paper. Pop. of urban district, 41,000.

Wath-upon-Dearne, a Yorkshire town, 6 miles N. of Rotherham. It has collieries, ironworks, &c. Pop. (1851) 1495; (1901) 8515; (1911) 11,823.

Watling's Island, one of the Bahamas (q.v.), the probable landfall of Columbus.

Watling Street, one of the great Roman highways of Britain, ran from London to Wroxeter. The name, of which the origin is unknown, has been extended to other ancient roads.

Watlington, a market-town of Oxfordshire, 8 miles NE. of Wallingford. Pop. of parish, 1500.

Watton, a Norfolk market-town, 12 miles N. of Thetford. Near it is Wayland Wood, scene of the 'Babes in the Wood' tragedy. Pop. 1400.

Wauke'gan, capital of Lake county, Illinois, on the west shore of Lake Michigan, 36 miles by rail N. by W. of Chicago. Pop. 16,000.

Wau'kesha, capital of a county, Wisconsin, on Fox River, 19 miles W. of Milwaukee. Pop. 9000.

Wausau (Waw'saw), a town of Wisconsin, 210 miles NW. of Milwaukee. It sends much lumber down the Wisconsin River. Pop. 16,560.

Wave'ney, a river of Norfolk and Suffolk, flowing 50 miles ENE. to the Yare, 4½ miles WSW. of Yarmouth.

Waverley. See FARNHAM.

Wavertree, a SE. suburb of Liverpool.

Wavre (Vahvr), a Belgian town, 15 miles SE. of Brussels; pop. 9000. Here on 18th June 1815 the Prussians prevented Grouchy from joining Napoleon at Waterloo.

Wayland Wood. See WATTON.

Wazan', a town of Morocco, 90 miles SE. of Tangier; pop. 20,000. It is a sacred city, the headquarters of the Grand Shereef.

Wazirabad', a town of the Punjab, 21 miles N. of Gujranwala by rail. Pop. 15,462.

Waziristan', a highland country between the Kurram and Gomul passes. Formerly Afghan, it was transferred to British India in 1894, and is now part of the NW. Frontier Province.

Weald. See KENT, SUSSEX.

Wear, a river of Durham (q.v.), 65 miles long. See also SUNDERLAND.

Weaver, a Cheshire river flowing 45 miles to the Mersey, 2½ miles below Runcorn.

Weddell Sea. See ANTARCTIC OCEAN.

Wedmore, a Somerset parish (pop. 2600), 8 miles WNW. of Wells. Here peace was signed in 878 between King Alfred and Guthrum the Dane.

Wed'nesbury (locally Wedgebury), a town of S. Staffordshire, 8 miles NW. of Birmingham. Crowning a hill at the north end of the town is the cruciform Perpendicular church of St Bartholomew, supposed to occupy the site of a temple of Woden—whence the Anglo-Saxon name, Wodnesbeorh. It seems to have been built in the 11th, and rebuilt in the 15th c., and was much altered and restored between 1766 and 1885. Here, too, in 916 the Princess Ethelfleda, Edward the Elder's sister, founded a castle. Modern buildings are the town-hall (1872), public baths and free library (1878), and art gallery and museum (1891). One of the great iron towns of the Black Country, in a district abounding in coalpits, ironworks, railways, and canals, Wednesbury has manufactures of boiler-plates, bar-iron, steel, gas and steam tubes, edge tools, &c. In 1886 it was incorporated as a municipal borough, and in 1867 was made a parliamentary borough, returning one member, and till 1885 including West Bromwich (q.v.). Pop. (1851) 11,914; (1911) 28,103.

Wednesfield, a NE. suburb of Wolverhampton.

Wei-hai-wei, a harbour in the Chinese peninsula of Shantung, 40 miles E. of Che-foo, secured by Britain on a lease of twenty-five years, as Port Arthur (q.v.) had been by Russia. Pop. of ceded strip round the bay, 150,000.

Weimar (Vī-mar), the capital of the German grand duchy of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, on the Ilm's left bank, 31 miles E. of Gotha and 155 SW. of Berlin. The lustre conferred on it by the residence of Goethe, Schiller, Herder, and Wieland, at the court of Karl-August, has faded, and the interest of the place (Thackeray's 'Pumpernickel') is almost wholly derived from its monuments, traditions, and associations. The town church (Stadtkirche), dating from 1400, contains the tombs of Bernhard of Weimar, Herder, &c. Other buildings are the handsome ducal palace, rebuilt in 1790–1803 after the fire of 1774; the Rothes Schloss (1574); the Grünes Schloss, with a library of 180,000 volumes, and relics of Luther and Gustavus Adolphus; the court theatre (rebuilt 1825), where Liszt produced Wagner's Lohengrin; and the houses of Cranach, Goethe, Schiller, and Herder. Pop. 35,000.

Weissenburg (Vīce'en-boorg). See WISSEMBOURG.

Weissenfels (Vīce'en-fels), a town of Prussian Saxony, 35 miles SW. of Leipzig. Pop. 35,000.

Welbeck Abbey, the seat of the Duke of Portland, in Notts, 3 miles S. of Worksop. Occupying the site of an old Premonstratensian abbey, it stands in a park 10 miles in circumference, and is a stately Palladian edifice of the 17th and 18th centuries, greatly enlarged about 1864 by the fifth duke, to whom it owes its semi-underground picture-gallery, ball-room, and riding-school, the last 385 feet long, 104 wide, and 51 high.

Welland, a river flowing 70 miles to the Wash.

Welland Canal. See ERIE.

Welle (Wel'leh), a great river of Equatorial Africa, rising in the Monbuttu country and flowing westward to 19° W., then south-westward, and as the Mobangi or U-banghi entering the Congo. Schweinfurth, Stanley, and Grenfell have explored it.

Wellesley. See PENANG.

Wellingborough, a market-town of Northamptonshire, on a declivity near the confluence of the Ise with the Nen, 10½ miles ENE. of Northampton. Almost destroyed by fire in 1738, it has a chalybeate spring (the 'Red Well'), said to have been resorted to by Charles I.; a large parish church (restored 1861–74); a corn exchange (1861); a grammar-school (1595; new buildings, 1880); and boot-making, iron-smelting, &c. Population, 20,000.

Wellington, (1) a market-town of Shropshire, 2 miles NE. of the conspicuous Wrekin (1320 feet) and 10 E. of Shrewsbury. It stood near the ancient Watling Street, hence its name 'Watling Town.' Situated in a populous mining and agricultural district, it has manufactures of farm implements, &c., an Italian town-hall built in 1867 at a cost of £10,000, and a corn exchange (1868). The population is about 8000.—(2) A market-town of Somerset, 7 miles SW. of Taunton, near the Tone and the foot of the Black Downs (900 feet), which were crowned in 1817 by a Wellington obelisk. The 'Great Duke' took for some unknown motive his titles from this place; and its manor (held formerly by King Alfred, Asser, Aldhelm, the Protector Somerset, the Pophams, &c.) was purchased for him in 1813. Serges and other woollen goods are manufactured. Population, 7700. See Humphrey's History of Wellington (1890).

Wellington, the capital of New Zealand, on Port Nicholson, an inlet of Cook Strait, on the southern coast of the North Island, 150 miles by sea ENE. of Nelson. The fine harbour is 6 miles long and 5 broad. Wellington was settled in 1840, and after the removal of the seat of government hither in 1865 made rapid progress; it has good public buildings, including Government House, the Houses of Legislature, Anglican and R. C. cathedrals, a college, museum, &c. Amongst the industries are tanning, brewing, candle and soap works, boot-factories, meat-preserving, and shipbuilding. There is a public park, and the botanical gardens have an area of 100 acres. The suburb of Newton or South Wellington is connected by tramway. Pop. (1871) 13,488; (1911) 64,372, or with suburbs, 70,729.

Wellington College, Berkshire, 4 miles SSE.

of Wokingham, a public school, founded in 1853 in memory of the Duke of Wellington. Queen Victoria laid the foundation stone in 1856, and opened it in 1859. It has 90 scholarships for sons of deceased army officers and over 400 boys.

Wells, the city of Somerset, pleasantly situated at the foot of the Mendip Hills, 20 miles SW. of Bath and 20 (30 by rail) S. of Bristol. Here, near St Andrew's Well, from which and other springs the place took its name, King Ina in 704 established a house of secular canons; but the see was first founded in 909 by Edward the Elder. It was translated to Bath during the first half of the 12th c., and still is styled Bath and Wells, though Bath's connection has been purely titular since the Reformation. Among its seventy bishops have been Jocelin (1206–42), the 'second founder' of the cathedral, Fox, Wolsey, Barlow, Laud, and Ken. That cathedral, though one of the smallest yet perhaps the most beautiful of English cathedrals, is mainly Early English in style, and is 371 feet long, by 123 across the transept, while the height of the central tower is 160 feet, of the two western towers 130. Its principal glory is the west front, with its matchless sculptures (600 figures in all, of which 151 are life-size or colossal); but other features are the north porch, the inverted tower arches, the east Jesse window with its splendid old glass, the exquisite lady chapel, and the octagonal chapter-house. Other buildings, all of extreme interest, are the moated episcopal palace, with an undercrypt of about 1220; the deanery (temp. Edward IV.); the archdeaconry, now a theological college; the gateways; and St Cuthbert's church, with a noble west tower. Chartered by King John in 1202, Wells lost one of its members in 1867, and the second in 1868. Pop. 4600. See works by Britton (1821), Cockerell (1851), Parker (1860), Freeman (1870), Reynolds (1881), Jewers (1892), and the Victoria History of Somerset.

Wells-next-the-Sea, or Wells, a Norfolk seaport, 31 miles NE. of Lynn. Pop. 2555.

Wellsville, a town of Ohio, on the Ohio River, 48 miles by rail WNW. of Pittsburgh, with steel and terra-cotta works. Pop. 6500.

Welshpool, a town of Montgomeryshire, North Wales, near the Severn's left bank, 20 miles W. by S. of Shrewsbury. It has a parish church (restored by Street), a town-hall and market (1873) with a clock-tower 90 feet high, and the Powysland Museum (1874); whilst 1 mile south is Powis Castle, dating from the 12th c., with a fine picture-gallery and park—the seat from Elizabeth's time of the Herberts, as now of their and Clive's descendant, the Earl of Powis. The flannel manufacture has migrated to Newtown. Incorporated by James I. in 1615, Welshpool is one of the six Montgomeryshire (q.v.) boroughs. Population, 6000.

Welwyn, a parish of Herts, 5 miles N. of Hatfield. Young thought his Night Thoughts here, and here lies buried.

Wem, a market-town of Shropshire, on the Ellesmere Canal, 11 miles N. by E. of Shrewsbury. Here Hazlitt passed his boyhood, and here met Coleridge. Pop. 2300.

Wembly, Middlesex, 2½ miles ESE. of Harrow, has been constituted an urban district, and has a pop. of 11,000.—Wembly Park, a Londoners' pleasure-resort, was opened in 1894, with a great revolving wheel, &c.

Wemyss (Weemz; Gael. Uaimh, 'a cave'), a S. coast parish of Fife, 2 miles NE. of Dysart, containing the villages of East and West Wemyss, with pops. of 2800 and 1600.

Wemyss Bay, a small Renfrewshire watering-place, on the Firth of Clyde, just N. of Skelmorlie, and 30½ W. of Glasgow.

Wen-chow (Wan-chau), a Chinese treaty port in Cheh-kiang province. Pop. 80,000.

Wen'dover, a parish of Bucks, under the Chiltern Hills, 5 miles SE. of Aylesbury. It sent members to parliament till 1832. Pop. 2000.

Wener, Lake (Vayner), a lake of SW. Sweden, after Ladoga and Onega the largest in Europe. It is 93 miles long, 50 miles in greatest breadth, 300 feet in greatest depth, and 150 feet above sea-level; area, 2408 sq. m. From the NW. and S. shores, peninsulas project to within 15 miles of one another; the part SW. of this is called Dalbo Lake. There are many islands.

Wenham Lake, Massachusetts, 22 miles NNE. of Boston, yields large quantities of ice, as does another Wenham Lake (named after the American one) in Norway, at Drobak, near Christiania.

Wenlock, a municipal borough of Shropshire, extending over more than 50 sq. m., and comprising Much Wenlock, Broseley, Coalport, Madeley, Ironbridge, and Coalbrookdale. It was incorporated by Edward IV. in 1448, and till 1885 returned two members. Much Wenlock, under the NE. end of Wenlock Edge, 12 miles SE. of Shrewsbury, has a quaint guildhall (restored 1848), a market-hall (1879), a corn exchange (1852), a museum, and interesting remains of a Cluniac abbey. Pop. of borough (1861) 19,699; (1911) 15,244.

Wensum, a Norfolk stream flowing 30 miles SE. to the Yare at Norwich.

Wentwood Forest, Monmouthshire, 4½ miles SSE. of Usk.

Wentworth Castle, Yorkshire, the Wentworths' seat (1730–68), 3 miles SSW. of Barnsley.

Wentworth-Woodhouse, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 4¾ miles NW. of Rotherham, the seat of Earl Fitzwilliam, as its predecessor was of his great ancestor, the Earl of Strafford.

Weobly (Web'ly), a town, till 1832 a parl. borough, 12½ miles NW. of Hereford. Pop. 700.

Werdau (Vayr-dow), a Saxon cloth-making town, 45 miles S. of Leipzig. Pop. 20,000.

Werden, a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Ruhr, 16 miles NE. of Düsseldorf. Pop. 12,000.

Wernigerode (Vayr-nĭ-ge-ro'deh), a town of Prussia, at the N. foot of the Harz Mountains, 50 miles SW. of Magdeburg. Pop. 14,500.

Werwicque (Vair-veek), a Belgian town on the French frontier, with a 14th-c. church, and great tobacco manufacture. Pop. 9000.

Wesel (Vay'zel), a strongly fortified town of Prussia, at the Lippe's confluence with the Rhine, 35 miles NW. of Düsseldorf. Cloth, pottery, machinery, &c. are manufactured. Pop. 25,000.

Weser (Vay'zer), a river of Germany, formed at Münden by the Werra and Fulda, and flowing N. through Prussia, till, passing Bremen, it forms for 40 miles the boundary between Oldenburg and Prussia, and enters the North Sea by a wide but shallow estuary, after a course of 280 miles.

Wessex, the ancient kingdom of the West Saxons, comprising Berks, Hants, Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall. Mr Thomas Hardy, whose native county is Dorsetshire, has made the name once more familiar.

West Australia. See Western Australia.

West Bay City, once a separate town of Michigan, is now united with Bay City, across the Saginaw River.

West'borough, a manufacturing town of Massachusetts, 32 miles by rail W. by S. of Boston, with a state reform school. Pop. 5429.

West Brom'wich, a Staffordshire town, one of the most important in the 'Black Country,' 5½ miles NW. of Birmingham, 90 SSE. of Liverpool, 93 NNE. of Bristol, and 113 NW. of London. The Bromwic of Domesday, and the seat in the 12th c. of a Benedictine priory, it yet is of modern growth, having risen within the last hundred years from a mere village on a barren heath, in consequence of the rich coal and iron mines near, of the industries to which these give rise, and of the transport facilities by rail and canal. The public buildings, erected in 1875 at a cost of £30,000, comprise a town-hall with a fine organ, a tower 130 feet high, a market-hall, free library, public baths, &c. There are also the institute (1886), All Saints Church (rebuilt 1872), Christ Church (1829), with a tower 114 feet high and twelve bells, the West Bromwich district hospital (1867–82), and a public park of 65½ acres, with a boating and bathing pool, and commanding a beautiful view. The last was presented to the town in 1878–87 by the Earl of Dartmouth, whose ancestor purchased the manor in 1823. The manufactures comprise all departments of Birmingham hardware, as gun-barrels, axle-boxes, locks, swords, bayonets, fire-irons, fenders, saucepans, safes, cooking-ranges, gas-stoves, &c. Puddling and sheet-iron rolling, sheet-glass making, coal-mining, and brick-making are also carried on. In 1867 West Bromwich was included within the parliamentary borough of Wednesbury, but since 1885 itself has returned a member. It was made a municipal borough in 1882, a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1801) 5687; (1841) 26,121; (1881) 56,295; (1911) 68,332. See a work by Joseph Reeves (1836).

West'bury, a market-town of Wiltshire, 16½ miles SSE. of Bath and 25 NW. of Salisbury. Returning till 1832 two members, and then till 1885 one, it has lost its clothing industry, but has iron-smelting works. The fine church has memories of Walter Map and Mackonochie. Westbury White Horse, on the S. slope of Westbury Down (775 feet), is 175 feet long, and was restored in 1778 and 1853. It probably commemorates Alfred the Great's victory of Ethandún (Edington) in 878. Pop. 3400.

West Calder. See CALDER.

West Chester, a town of Pennsylvania, 27 miles W. of Philadelphia. Pop. 12,000.

West Derby, a NW. suburb of Liverpool.

West Drayton. See DRAYTON.

Westerham, a market-town of Kent, 5 miles W. of Sevenoaks; pop. 3000. Wolfe was a native.

Westerkirk, a Dumfriesshire parish, 6 miles NW. of Langholm. Telford was a native.

Westerly, a village of Rhode Island, 44 miles SSW. of Providence. Pop. 8550.

Western Australia embraces the western third of Australia, to the W. of South Australia and the Northern Territory. It extends from 13° to 35° S. lat. and 113° to 129° E. long., being 1500 miles long by 1000 broad. The area is 975,920 sq. m., or 624,588,800 acres—i.e. nearly twenty times the size of England. While the central portions are stony or sandy, with the north and south coasts poor in soil, there is good land at the west and in the north-east. Less hilly than eastern Australia, it is not so well watered. The Darling Range, 300 miles in length, has few peaks of 3000 feet; Koikyeunerup, north of King George's Sound, is 3500 feet; and the King Leopold Mountains are north-east. Few rivers run in the dry season. There are shallow salt lakes inland, and a number of islands off the coast. Perth, the capital (pop. 55,000), has Fremantle (pop. 20,000) for its port. Albany (4000), on King George's Sound, is 261 miles SE. of Perth. Boulder has 12,000 inhabitants. The climate is dry and bright, though the N. and NW. are uncomfortably hot. Perth varies from 38° to 106° in the shade; its average annual rainfall is 33 inches. Pop. (1870) 25,353, including 1790 convicts; (1881) 29,708; (1901) 194,890; (1911) 283,986; besides about 8850 aborigines.

The natural history is not unlike that of the rest of Australia (q.v.). Trepang or bêche-de-mer furnishes an export. Timber of excellent quality (mainly eucalyptus, including the jarrah, wandoo, &c.) abounds to the SW. There are 150 acacias, and sandalwood grows. There are six pastoral districts in the state. The desert has some good oases. Of 130,000 acres in crop, wheat and other cereals do well. The gardens have twenty-five sorts of fruits, grapes being fine and abundant. But the western portion only has moisture enough for ordinary husbandry. Granite and recent limestone are the great geological features. There are many workable seams of good coal and lignite. Geraldine, in the Victoria district, had lead and copper mines in 1842. The Greenbushes yield tin. Magnetite and hematite iron occur in immense lodes; manganese and antimony are found. A little gold was found in 1868 and succeeding years, in larger quantities since 1885 in the districts of Kimberley, Yilgarn, Southern Cross, Pilbarra, Ashburton, Roebourne, and Murchison, and later at Coolgardie and Kalgoorlie, where the finds surpassed all previous Australian experience. Lack of water hampers mining progress, and the sinking of artesian wells and making of tanks is being carried out. The imports for 1892 were £1,391,000; the exports (gold, silver, copper, wool, skins, jarrah, pearls, tin, and karri), £882,148. In 1910 these had increased to £7,908,500 and £7,715,000 respectively. Revenue (1880), £180,050; (1892) £543,889; (1911) £3,850,500. Expenditure (1880), £204,337; (1892) £550,616; (1911) £3,734,500. The debt in 1911 was £23,283,000. The railways extend to upwards of 3000 miles (government property, except about 600 in private hands). Spaniards and Portuguese had the western and northern coasts in their maps about 1530. The Dutch (Dirk Hartog, Edel, De Witt, &c.) rediscovered these parts in 1616–27. A temporary settlement was made from Sydney, at the Sound, in 1825. A private association in 1828 obtained land from the government, and in 1829 founded the Swan River Settlement at Fremantle, Perth also dating from the same year. Transportation hither began in 1850, and ceased in 1867. Responsible government was granted in 1890; and the former colony is now one of the federated states of the Australian Commonwealth (1901). See books by Giles (1889), Bonwick (1890), Hart (1893), Calvert (1894), J. M. Price (1896), May Vivienne (1901), and the annuals and bluebooks.

Westfield, a town of Massachusetts, 9 miles by rail W. of Springfield. Pop. 16,000.

West Ham. See Ham, West.

West Hartlepool. See Hartlepool.

Westhoughton, a town of Lancashire, 5 miles E. of Wigan, with manufactures of silk, cotton, and nails, and neighbouring collieries. Pop. 15,000.

West Indies, the great archipelago which extends in a vast curve from Florida in North America to the north coast of South America, separating the Atlantic Ocean from the Mexican Gulf and the Caribbean Sea. The name still bears testimony to the belief cherished by Columbus that when he reached in the Bahamas (q.v.) the outlying portion of the New World he was actually on or close to that old-world India he was seeking. The name Antilles (q.v.), which is applied to the whole of the islands save the Bahamas, retains a trace of the belief in the old submerged continent of Antiglia. The table gives their area, population, and political connection (see also the several articles thereon):

Calcareous rocks predominate, in some cases overlying granite and other igneous rocks; some of the minor Antilles are wholly volcanic; coral-reefs are found on many of them. All the islands except the northern Bahamas are tropical, and are liable to severe hurricanes. The productions are luxuriant and varied. Great events were the discovery (1492); the Spanish occupation; the introduction of negro slaves (1525) to take the place of the native Carib Indians, decimated by forced labour on the plantations; the development of the sugar industry; the gradual intrusion in the 17th century of French, English, and Dutch. Between 1635 and 1719 France secured Guadeloupe, Martinique, Grenada, and St Vincent; in 1632 Tobago and Curaçao became Dutch; in 1623–1763 England obtained possession of St Christopher, Barbadoes, Antigua, Dominica, and the Grenadines. England's growing power at sea forced France to cede St Lucia, Grenada, and St Vincent; and there was fierce fighting in these regions, Rodney's defeat of the French fleet off Dominica in 1782 being one of the great naval battles of the world. The West Indies were long haunted by the Buccaneers, and some were used by Britain as penal settlements. The abolition of slavery in the English islands (1834–38), however creditable to the public conscience, was regarded by the planters and their friends as the main reason for the great decline in prosperity, from which the islands have but partially recovered. See works by M. G. Lewis (1834), Champlain (1859), Trollope (1859; new ed. 1869), Bates (1878), Kingsley (1869), Acosta (1880), Eves (1891), Froude (1888), Paton (1888), Bulkeley (1890), Lucas (1905), Aspinall (1912).

Westland, a provincial district (capital, Hokitika) of New Zealand, occupies the W. portion of South Island. Area, 4641 sq. m.; pop. 15,800.

Westmeath, an inland county of Leinster, Ireland, between Meath and Roscommon. Greatest length NE. and SW., 45 miles; greatest breadth, 25 miles; area, 453,468 acres. The surface is for the most part level, the hilly district in the north not exceeding 710 feet. Of the numerous lakes, one chain belongs to the basin of the Shannon, which river forms with them the western boundary; the other, towards the east, flows into the basin of the Boyne. The Royal Canal traverses the county. The soil is a deep loam, producing good pasture for cattle. There is little tillage. The chief towns are the capital, Mullingar, and Athlone, formerly partly in Roscommon. The county returns two members. Westmeath anciently formed a portion of the kingdom of Meath (q.v.), but in Henry VIII.'s reign was erected into a separate county, and at first included Longford and part of King's County. Many Anglo-Norman and some Celtic antiquities are found in this picturesque county. Pop. (1841) 141,578; (1861) 90,879; (1881) 71,798; (1911) 59,986—55,000 Catholics.

West'morland, a northern county of England, bounded by Cumberland, Durham, Yorkshire, and Lancashire. With a very irregular outline, it has an extreme length from N. to S. of 32 miles, an extreme breadth from E. to W. of 40 miles, and an area of 505,864 acres or 790 sq. m. The surface is mountainous, the highest summits being Helvellyn (q.v., 3118 feet) on the Cumberland boundary, Bow Fell (2959), Fairfield (2950), Dufton Fell (2803), and Dun Fell (2780). The western portion of the county belongs to the Lake District (q.v.), its lakes including Windermere (q.v.) on the Lancashire boundary, and Ullswater (q.v.), on that with Cumberland, besides Grasmere, Howes Water, Rydal Water, &c. The moorlands—to which Westmorland owes its name—are numerous and extensive; but along the courses of the Kent in the S. and the Eden in the N. (the principal streams) there are tracts of fertile land. Of the 400,000 acres in cultivation less than 90,000 are under corn; woods and plantations cover 17,000 acres. The climate is moist and mild, but with often much snow in winter. Coal, lead, copper, slate, and graphite are the chief mineral productions. Westmorland, which is in the diocese of Carlisle, comprises four wards, 113 parishes, and the towns of Appleby, Ambleside, and Kendal. It returns one member apiece for the Northern or Appleby and the Southern or Kendal division. Worthies have been Bernard Gilpin, Catharine Parr, Ann Clifford, Countess of Pembroke, Bishop Watson, Wordsworth, Prof. Wilson, Hartley Coleridge, Dr Arnold, Miss Martineau, and Sir J. G. Wilkinson; and Clifton Moor was the scene of a Jacobite skirmish (1745). Pop. (1801) 40,805; (1841) 56,454; (1881) 64,191; (1911) 63,575. See the Quarterly Review for January 1867; works cited there and at Lake District; and others by E. Bellasis (2 vols. Kendal, 1892), and R. S. Ferguson (1894).

Weston-super-Mare (May'reh), a fashionable watering-place of Somerset, on the Bristol Channel, 20 miles SW. of Bristol. Grown from a fishing-village since 1805, it is sheltered by rocky, fir-clad Worle Hill (306 feet); commands a splendid view over to Wales; and has an esplanade (begun 1825) 3 miles long, a promenade pier (1867) 1040 feet long, the Prince Consort gardens, potteries, &c. Pop. 24,000.

Westphalia, a former duchy and kingdom, a Prussian province, named from the Westfalen, a western tribe of Saxons, as distinguished from the Ostfalen, nearer the Elbe. About 1180 it came under the Archbishops of Cologne, as Dukes of Westphalia. It was the headquarters of the Vehmgerichte. In 1807 Westphalia, with parts of Hesse, Hanover, Brunswick, and Saxony, was made into a kingdom for Jerome Bonaparte; in 1813 the kingdom came to an end, and the Congress of Vienna assigned the present province to Prussia. It has an area of 7800 sq. m. (larger than Wales) and a pop. (1910) of 4,125,096, of whom 2,121,534 were Catholics. The northern portion belongs to the great North German plain, and is not fertile; the south is hilly, with fertile valleys. Westphalian hams are still in high repute; but Westphalia's peculiar wealth lies in its minerals—coal, iron, zinc, copper, sulphur, with lead, antimony, &c. Iron-working is largely carried on, and linen-weaving has been an important industry since the 14th century—Bielefeld being the great centre. Münster has cotton-works.

West Point, the U.S. Military Academy, on the Hudson's right bank, 48 miles by rail N. of New York. Established in 1802, on the site of an older fort, it occupies a plateau 188 feet above the river, surrounded by the bold scenery of one of the finest river-passes in the world.

Westport, a Mayo seaport, at the head of Clew Bay, 13 miles SW. of Castlebar. Pop. 3700.

West Prussia. See PRUSSIA.

Westray, an Orkney Island, 10½ miles NNE. of Pomona. Area, 24¼ sq. m.; greatest height, 556 feet; pop. 1700.

West Troy. See TROY, U.S.

West Virginia is the most irregular in form of all the states of the American Union; nearly all the boundary lines follow the courses of rivers or the crests of mountain-ranges. It borders on Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. Area, 24,780 sq. m. In the NE. a small portion of the state belongs to the Shenandoah valley. The 'mountain region' is formed by the western ridges of the Appalachian system. In the north the streams are tributary to the Potomac; but toward the south they frequently cut through the mountain-ridges in deep gorges, flowing W. or NW. to the Ohio River. The 'hilly region' is a portion of the Appalachian or Cumberland plateau. Much of the state is well wooded. The climate is equable, the rainfall abundant. The soil is mostly fertile. In the mountain region there is an abundance of fine pasturage, and the annual product of butter and cheese is very large. The great Appalachian coalfield covers almost the entire state. West Virginia ranks fourth among the states in its coal output, and second in the production of coke; the pig-iron and steel products are increasing. Salt and petroleum-oil are also products. Of the mineral springs the White Sulphur Springs are the most widely known. The chief cities are Wheeling, Charleston (the capital), Huntington, and Parkersburg. At Morgantown is the state university. Until the Secession, this state was included in Virginia; but the inhabitants of the northern and western counties remained loyal to the federal government, and in 1863 West Virginia was admitted to the Union as a separate state. Pop. (1870) 442,014; (1910), 1,221,119.

Westward Ho, on the coast of North Devon, 2½ miles W. of Bideford, owes its name and its existence to Charles Kingsley's Elizabethan romance (1855); this pretty cluster of villas and lodging-houses, with its church, hotel, clubhouse, and college, having sprung up since 1867. The bathing facilities are excellent, and it is a great resort of golfers. The village is in the urban district of Northam.

Wetherby, a Yorkshire town, on the Wharfe, 12 miles NNE. of Leeds. Pop. of parish, 2300.

Wetter, LAKE (Vetter), after Lake Wener (q.v.) the largest lake in Sweden, lies in Gothland, 25 miles SE. of Lake Wener. Surrounded by lofty shores, it is 70 miles long, 13 miles broad, 850 sq. m. in area, 370 feet deep, and 270 feet above sea-level. It receives about ninety small tributaries, and sends off the Motala River eastward to the Baltic. Its waters are of a beautiful clear green. It is remarkable for an irregular alternation of risings and fallings, and for an occasional violent undulation in perfectly still weather.

Wetterhorn (w as v; 'Peak of Tempests'), a mountain of the Bernese Oberland, E. of the Grindelwald, 10 miles SE. of the Lake of Brienz. Its three peaks are 12,149, 12,165, and 12,110 feet high, and were first ascended in 1844 and 1845.

Wetzlar (w as v), a cathedral city of Rhenish Prussia, 40 miles N. of Frankfort. Here is laid Goethe's Sorrows of Werther. Pop. 15,000.

Wexford, a maritime county of Leinster, bordering on Wicklow, Carlow, Kilkenny, and Waterford. Greatest length, 55 miles; greatest breadth, 30 miles; area, 573,200 acres. The coast-line is irregular and dangerous; Carnsore Point is the SE. extremity of Ireland. The greater part of the surface is level, but Mount Leinster, on the border, is 2610 feet high. The chief river, the Slaney, enters the sea through Wexford Harbour; the Barrow is part of the boundary. The soil varies from light and sandy to stiff clay, but the county has a verdant luxuriance. The fisheries are valuable. The principal towns are Wexford, Enniscorthy, New Ross, and Gorey. The maritime position of Wexford laid it open early to the incursions of the Danes, and it was the first landing-place of the English. In the insurrection of 1798 it formed the theatre of the only serious conflicts. There are many old castles, and the monasteries of Dunbrody, Tintern, and Ross. Wexford returns two members. Pop. (1841) 202,196; (1861) 143,594; (1911) 102,273—95,000 Catholics.

WEXFORD, the capital, a seaport and municipal borough, is situated at the Slaney's mouth, 93 miles S. of Dublin by rail. The estuary of the Slaney forms Wexford Harbour, which, though spacious, is shallow and impeded by a bar. Parts of the old fortifications and of St Selsker's priory remain. The town was taken by Cromwell in 1644. Till 1885 it returned a member. Pop. (1881) 12,163; (1911) 11,455. See works by R. Fraser (1807) and M. Doyle (1868).

Wey (Way), a river of Hants and Surrey, flowing 35 miles NE. to the Thames at Weybridge.

Weybourne, a Norfolk coast parish, 13 miles ENE. of Walsingham. England, according to a rhymed prophecy, is to be conquered hence.

Weybridge, a Surrey Thames-side urban district, 3½ miles SE. of Chertsey. Brooklands, with motor-track and aerodrome, is near. Pop. 6300.

Weyhill. See ANDOVER.

Weymouth, a fashionable watering-place of Dorset, 7½ miles S. of Dorchester, and 77 S. of Bristol, lies at the mouth of the little Wey, on a beautiful bay, bounded E. by St Albans Head and W. by the 'Isle' of Portland (q.v.), and here divided by the projecting Nothe into Weymouth Bay and Portland Roads. The Wey, after widening into the tidal 'Backwater,' enters the sea, and separates the two quarters of the town—old Weymouth proper on the south, and modern Melcombe-Regis, facing the bay, on the north. Both were separate boroughs till 1571, and they still returned two members apiece till 1832, then two conjointly till 1885. A bridge, reconstructed in 1881, connects them; and Melcombe-Regis, which rose into repute through George III.'s frequent visits from 1789, has capital sands, an esplanade over a mile long, statues of King George (1809) and Sir H. Edwards (1885), numerous hotels, and a pile pier 1050 feet long, constructed in 1859 at a cost of £12,000. The Nothe has been strongly fortified since the Crimean war. Steamers run to the Channel Islands, and there is an export trade in Portland stone and Roman cement. Thomas Love Peacock was born here, and here Southey first saw the sea. Pop. (1821) 6622; (1851) 9458; (1911) 22,324. See works by G. A. Ellis (1829) and Robert Damon (1860).

Weymouth, a township of Massachusetts, on Massachusetts Bay, 12 miles SSE. of Boston, with the four villages of Weymouth, and East, North, and South Weymouth. Pop. 13,350.

Whalley, a Lancashire village, on the Calder, 3¾ miles S. by W. of Clitheroe, with a ruined Cistercian abbey (1296).

Whalsay, a Shetland island, 13½ miles NNE. of Lerwick. Area, 7¾ sq. m.; greatest height, 393 feet; pop. 1000.

Whang-hai. See YELLOW SEA.

Wharfe, a Yorkshire river, flowing 60 miles ESE. to the Ouse near Cawood.

Wharncliffe, a Yorkshire village, 6½ miles NNW. of Sheffield.

Wharncliffe Viaduct, on the Great Western, at Hanwell (q.v.), is 896 feet long and 70 high.

Wheeling, the principal city of West Virginia, on the left bank of the Ohio River, and at the mouth of Wheeling Creek, at the foot of steep hills, 67 miles by rail and 92 by river SW. of Pittsburgh. The National Road here crosses the Ohio, by a wire suspension bridge, 1010 feet in span; and a fine railway bridge connects the city with Bellaire, Ohio. For ten years (1875–85) Wheeling was the state capital. The hills around are full of bituminous coal; and there are blast-furnaces, foundries and forges, nail-factories, glass-works, woollen, flour, and paper mills, &c. Pop. (1880) 30,737; (1910) 41,641.

Whickham, a manufacturing town of Durham, 3½ miles SW. of Gateshead. Pop. 18,300.

Whidah. See DAHOMEY.

Whit'adder, a Berwickshire stream, flowing 34 miles to the Tweed, 2½ miles above Berwick.

Whitby, a seaport and watering-place in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 54½ miles by rail (by road 45) NNE. of York and 22 NNW. of Scarborough. It stands, looking northward over the German Ocean, at the mouth of the Esk, which here emerges from its wooded dells and forms a wide tidal pool, walled in by jet-veined cliffs of alum shale. A stone bridge (rebuilt 1835), 172 feet long, with a swivel by which vessels are admitted to the inner harbour, connects the two halves of the town. Its older portions on the east side, with steep narrow streets and red-tiled houses, climb tier upon tier up the cliff, where stand the ruined abbey of St Hilda and the ancient parish church of St Mary. St Hilda (614–680) founded in 657 the monastery of Streanshalh, which has memories of Cædmon and St John of Beverley, and where in 664 was held the great 'Council of Whitby.' It was burned in 867 by the Danes (who changed the name of the place to Presteby or Whyteby, 'priests' or white town'), but in 1078 was refounded as a Benedictine abbey for monks. The stately ruins of the church, which was 300 feet long, comprise choir, north transept, and part of the nave, the great central tower having fallen in 1830. Between the abbey and the cliff is the parish church, originally Norman, gained from the town by nearly 200 steps; and on the south side is Whitby Hall (c. 1580). Of modern buildings may be mentioned the town-hall (1788), the museum (1823) on the west pier, and the Saloon (1878), in Queen Anne style, with concert-room, promenade, &c., on the side of the West Cliff, which is surmounted by the fashionable terraces of Hudson, the 'Railway King' (1845). The west and east piers, 300 and 800 yards long, protect the outer harbour; and at the extremity of the former is a lighthouse (1831), 83 feet high, like a Doric column. The whale-fishery (1733–1837) belongs to the past, but the shipping is still considerable. Iron shipbuilding is carried on by one firm, though Captain Cook, who was a 'prentice here, might no longer choose Whitby-built ships as 'the stoutest bottoms' in England. The herring and other fisheries are actively prosecuted; but Whitby's specialty is the (decayed) manufacture of jet. It returned one member from 1832 till 1885. The population is about 11,000. See works by Charlton (1779), Young (1817), F. K. Robinson (1876), and Canon Atkinson (1894).

Whitchurch, (1) a Hampshire town, 12 miles N. of Winchester. Till 1832 a parl. borough, it manufactures silk, serges, and shalloons. Pop. 2400.—(2) A Shropshire town, 19 miles N. by E. of Shrewsbury. Malting and brewing are carried on. Pop. 6000.

Whitechapel. See LONDON, p. 423.

Whitefield, or STAND, a town of Lancashire, 5¼ miles N. of Manchester. Dating from 1826, it has many fine residences, cotton manufactures, and neighbouring collieries. Pop. 7000.

Whitehall, a town of New York, at the head of Lake Champlain, and the end of the Champlain Canal, 78 miles N. by E. of Albany. Pop. 5000.

Whiteha'ven, a municipal borough and seaport of Cumberland, 80 miles NW. of Lancaster. Dating from 1633, it has owed its well-being to great collieries and hæmatite iron mines. There are blast-furnaces, iron-shipbuilding yards, iron and brass foundries, and manufactures of coarse linen, sail-cloth, ropes, soap, and earthenware. The harbour has a wet-dock of five acres, two piers constructed in 1824–41, and a lighthouse; and steamers ply to Liverpool, Dublin, Belfast, and Ramsey. Whitehaven was attacked by Paul Jones in 1778, and suffered from a mining subsidence in 1791. It has returned one member since 1832. Pop. (1851) 18,916; (1911) 19,044.

White Horse, the name applied to a figure of a horse on a hillside, formed by removing the turf, so as to show the underlying chalk. The most famous is that at Uffington, Berkshire, 4 miles SE. of Shrivenham. It measures 355 feet from nose to tail and 120 from ear to heel; is traditionally supposed to commemorate Alfred the Great's victory of Ashdown (871); is mentioned about Henry II.'s time as existing prior to 1084; and has been periodically 'scoured'—fourteen times during 1755–1857, then not till 1884. Other White Horses are at Bratton Hill, Westbury (175 × 107 feet), Cherhill (129 × 142 feet), Marlborough (62 × 47 feet), Pewsey (180 × 167 feet), &c. See a work by Plenderleath (new ed. 1892).

Whitekirk, a Haddingtonshire coast parish, 4¾ miles SE. of North Berwick, with a church (burned 1914) that was a great resort of pilgrims.

White Mountains, an Appalachian (q.v.) group, in New Hampshire (q.v.). Mount Washington has a carriage-road and an hotel on its summit, with a powerful electric light.

White River rises in Arkansas, and flows 800 miles (300 navigable) through it or Missouri, NE., E., SE., and S., to the Mississippi near the mouth of the Arkansas.

White Sea (Russian Bjeloje More), a branch of the Arctic Ocean penetrating 350 miles into Archangel province, N. Russia. It narrows to less than 50 miles, widens again, and forms the Kandalak Gulf, that of Archangel, into which the Dwina falls, and that into which the Onega falls. The sea-route hither was discovered by Chancellor in 1553; Archangel (q.v.) is the chief emporium on its shores. Usually frozen from the beginning of September till the end of May, it has direct water communication with the Dnieper and Volga, and so with the Black Sea and Caspian.

White Sulphur Springs, a watering-place of West Virginia, 227 miles by rail W. of Richmond.

Whithorn, a royal burgh in Wigtownshire, 3¼ miles NW. of the Isle of Whithorn, and 12¾ S. of Wigtown by rail. The Leukopibia of the Novantæ, Latin Candida Casa, and Old English Hwitaern, it was here that St Ninian founded a church (397), and here he was buried in 432. An Anglic bishopric (727–96) was re-established as the see of Galloway, the church of a Premonstratensian priory becoming the cathedral. It was a great place of pilgrimage. There remains now only a roofless, ivy-grown ruin. Pop. 1170.

Whiting Bay. See ARRAN.

Whitney, MOUNT, the highest mountain (14,898 feet) of the United States outside of Alaska, is in the Sierra Nevada in southern California.

Whit'stable, a long, straggling village in Kent, on the south shore of the Thames estuary, at the Swale's mouth, 6 miles NNW. of Canterbury. Its oysters are famous, the large artificial beds being regularly farmed. Pop. 8000.

Whittinghame (Whit'in-jame), a Haddingtonshire parish, 3 miles SSE. of East Linton, with the seat of the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour.

Whittlesey, a Cambridgeshire town, 5½ miles E. by S. of Peterborough. Whittlesey Mere, a former shallow lake (2 by 1 mile) in Hunts, 4 miles SW. of Whittlesey, is drained. The population is about 4200.

Whitwick, a ward of Coalville urban district, in Leicestershire, 5½ miles E. by S. of Ashby-de-la-Zouch. Hosiery is manufactured.

Whitworth, a town of Lancashire, 3 miles N. by W. of Rochdale, with cotton-mills. Pop. 9000.

Whydah, or WHIDAH. See DAHOMEY.

Wiborg. See VIBORG.

Wichita (Wish'e-taw or Wi-shee'taw), a city of southern Kansas, capital of Sedgwick county, on the Arkansas River's left bank, 505 miles W. by S. of St Louis and 228 SW. of Kansas City. It is the meeting-point of four great railway systems, and contains many other mills, &c. It was founded in 1870. Pop. (1880) 4911; (1910) 52,450.

Wick, the county town of Caithness, on the Wick River, at its entrance to Wick Bay, 161 miles by rail (1874) NNE. of Inverness. The royal burgh since 1902 includes Louisburgh, N. of the river, and Pultneytown (1808) on the S. bank. The harbour is tidal. Wick is a great centre of the herring-fishery, and has a general shipping trade. Pop. 9000.

Wickham Market, a Suffolk town, 5 miles NNE. of Woodbridge. Pop. of parish, 1300.

Wicklow, a maritime county of Leinster, borders on Dublin, Carlow, Kildare, and Wexford. Its greatest length is 40 miles, and greatest breadth 33; the area being 781 sq. m., or 500,178 acres, of which 118,000 are under tillage. The coast-line, in many parts precipitous, is obstructed by sandbanks. The Wicklow Mountains culminate in Lugnaquilla (3039 feet), and the glens are exceedingly picturesque, especially Glendalough, Glendalure, Imail, the Glen of the Downs, and Avoca. Some plains lie on the eastern and southern shores. The lakes, although strikingly beautiful, are few and small; and the rivers are mountain-streams, except the Liffey and the Slaney, which rise in Wicklow. Lead, copper, sulphur, and iron are raised, with some silver; a little gold has been found. Slates, limestone, and marl are likewise wrought. The fisheries are neglected; and the manufacture of flannels is nearly extinct. The county is divided into eight baronies. The principal towns are Wicklow, the capital, part of Bray, and Arklow. The county returns two members. Pop. (1841) 126,162; (1881) 70,386; (1911) 60,711, of whom 48,000 were Catholics. Wicklow was in 1605 erected into a separate county. It has many Celtic and ecclesiastical remains at Glendalough (q.v.), &c.—The county town, Wicklow, at the Vartry's mouth, 28 miles ESE. of Dublin, attracts many visitors for sea-bathing. Pop. 3243.

Wickwar, a Gloucestershire town, 4 miles N. of Chipping-Sodbury. Pop. 900.

Widdin, a town of NW. Bulgaria, on the Danube's right bank, 20 miles from the Servian frontier. For centuries the 'Virgin Fortress' was a strong Turkish post, famous in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877–78. Pop. 16,500.

Wid'nes, a borough of Lancashire, on the Mersey, 13 miles ESE. of Liverpool by rail, with manufactures of iron, copper, soda, soap, candles, manures, &c. Widnes, incorporated in 1892, is opposite Runcorn (q.v.). Pop. (1861) 4803; (1891) 30,011; (1901) 28,580; (1911) 31,541.

Wieliczka (Vyay-litch'ka), a town of Austrian Galicia, 10 miles SE. of Cracow by rail, with remarkable salt-mines. Pop. 6289.

Wiener-Neustadt, a manufacturing town of Lower Austria, 70 miles S. of Vienna. Pop. 33,000.

Wiesbaden (Vees-bâh'den), chief town of a Prussian district in the province of Hesse-Nassau, was formerly capital of the independent duchy of Nassau. One of the oldest and most famous of the German watering-places, it is delightfully situated on the south slopes of Mount Taunus, 5 miles NW. of Mainz. It has been called 'a city of lodging-houses;' the principal buildings are the palace (1840); the Kursaal (1810), with delightful park and gardens; the new town-hall (1888); the museum, picture-galleries, and library; the handsome Protestant church (1853–62); the superb Greek chapel (1855), built by the Duke of Nassau as a mausoleum for his duchess; the Catholic church; the synagogue, &c. Of its twenty hot-springs, which were known to the Romans, the principal is the Kochbrunnen ('Boiling-spring:' 156° F.). The saline hot-springs, containing silica and iron, are efficacious in gout, rheumatism, scrofula, and other skin diseases and nervous affections. Though the public gaming-tables were abolished in 1872, the number of visitors annually is about 60,000; some 5000 or 6000 strangers winter here annually. Pop. (1871) 35,463; (1910) 109,002.

Wiesen (Vee'zen), an alpine health-resort for the weak-chested, is 4771 feet above the sea-level, and 12½ miles SW. of Davos.

Wig'an, a town of Lancashire, on the Douglas (a feeder of the Ribble's estuary), 15½ miles S. by E. of Preston, 18½ NE. of Liverpool, and 18 WNW. of Manchester. Situated in the heart of a rich coalfield, and commanding easy communication by both rail and water, it is an ancient place, on the site, it is thought, of a Roman station, but owes its present development to the growth of the cotton industry. The manufactures include calicoes, ginghams, table-cloths, fustians, linen, iron, paper, &c., some of its cotton-mills and ironworks being among the largest in England. All Saints parish church, a stately edifice dating from the 14th c., was in great measure rebuilt in 1856; and there are also the county buildings (1888), public hall (1853), market-hall (1877), free public library (1878), infirmary (1873; enlarged 1884), baths (1882), grammar-school (1619; rebuilt 1876), mining and technical college (1903), and a public park (1878) of 27 acres, laid out at a cost of £20,000. A prescriptive borough, Wigan returned two members from Edward VI.'s reign till 1885, now only one; it became a county borough in 1888. Pop. (1831) 20,774; (1881) 48,194; (1911) 89,152. In 1642 Wigan was occupied by the royalist Earl of Derby, but it was twice taken by the parliamentarians; and in 1651 the earl was defeated here by Lilburne. Prince Charles Edward passed through. Leland was a native. See Sinclair's History of Wigan (2 vols. 1882).

Wight, The Isle of, is separated from Hampshire by the Solent (q.v.) and Spithead (q.v.). Its extreme length, E. to W., is 23 miles, and its extreme breadth, 13 miles. The area is 145 sq. m., or 92,931 acres. A bold range of chalk downs runs somewhat irregularly the entire length of the island, terminating on the west in the Needles (q.v.), and breaking off on the east at Culver and Bembridge. These downs at several points reach from 500 to 700 feet; but they are excelled in altitude by the high land on the extreme south or 'back' of the island, where St Boniface Down above Ventnor attains 787 feet. This is the highest point of the isle, though St Catharine's Beacon to the westward is only 6 feet less. The more elevated ground being thus on the south, the chief streams flow to the north, and three of them traverse nearly the whole breadth—the eastern Yar, the Medina, and the western Yar. The streams which flow southward are short, but they play an important part in the formation of 'chines,' narrow ravines worn through the soft rocks. Wight has long been in repute for the mildness of its climate, its fertility, and its picturesqueness, which have rendered it a most favourite resort. There are yet traces on the downs, in barrows and cairns, of the earlier inhabitants of the island, but its history really begins with its conquest by Vespasian as Insula Vectis. There is ample evidence that the island was well appreciated by the Romans, whose chief stations were probably at Carisbrooke (q.v.) and Brading (q.v.). Cerdic is said to have reduced the island in 530; but it did not fall definitely under Saxon rule until later. After the Norman Conquest it was given to William Fitzosborne, but was forfeited by his son, and passed to the Redvers family, who thence took the title of 'lords of the isle,' and held it till 1292, when it passed to the crown. There are several government establishments, as at Parkhurst, and sundry forts connected with the defences of Portsmouth and Spithead. Before 1832 Wight returned six members, two apiece for Newport, Yarmouth, and uninhabited Newtown. Now it has no parliamentary borough, and one member for the island only; but it has become an administrative county under the County Councils Act, 1888. Pop. (1851) 50,324; (1881) 73,633; (1911) 88,186. The towns are Ryde, Newport, East and West Cowes, Ventnor, St Helens, Sandown, and Shanklin. See works by Worsley (1781), Englefield (1816), Adams (1856), Stone (1891), and Shore (1892).

Wigton, a market-town of Cumberland, 11¼ miles by rail SW. of Carlisle. It manufactures ginghams and winceys. Pop. 3690.

Wigtown, a county forming the SW. corner of Scotland, the western half of Galloway, bounded by the Irish Channel, Ayrshire, the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, the Solway Firth, and the Irish Sea. Its length from E. to W. is 30 miles, its breadth from N. to S. 28 miles. Area, 311,984 acres; pop. (1851) 43,389; (1911) 31,990. Wigtownshire is deeply intersected by Loch Ryan (q.v.) and Luce Bay. The western peninsula thus formed, known as the Rhinns of Galloway, is 28 miles long from Corsewall Point to the Mull of Galloway. The south-eastern portion of the county forms a blunt triangular peninsula—the Machers—ending in Borough Head. The rest of the county bears the general name of the Moors, great part being occupied by bleak fells and high mosses. The surface is diversified, but the only hills of 1000 feet are on the northern borders: one solitary peak in the Rhinns, Cairn Piot, reaches 593 feet. The chief streams are the Cree, Bladenoch, Luce, and Piltanton. The lakes are very numerous, but small. The climate is mild, but moist. The entire industry is agricultural, 46 per cent. of the surface being arable, and the dairy farms having a high reputation. Towns are Stranraer, Wigtown, Newton-Stewart, Whithorn, Portpatrick, and Glenluce. See W. M'Ilwraith's Guide to Wigtownshire (1876); also books cited at Galloway.

Wigtown, a royal and municipal (and till 1885 parliamentary) burgh and seaport, on the W. side of Wigtown Bay, 129 miles SSW. of Edinburgh. It has a Tudor town-hall (1863), a parish church (1853), and in the churchyard the graves of the 'Wigtown martyrs,' an old woman and a young girl who, refusing the Abjuration Oath, were tied to stakes and drowned by the incoming tide, 11th May 1685. Pop. 1370.

Wi-ju (Wee-joo), the last considerable Corean town (pop. 30,000) towards the Chinese frontier, to the south of the Yalu estuary. It was opened to foreign trade in 1904.

Wildbad (Vild'bad), a town of Würtemberg, in the Black Forest, on the Enz, 33 miles SSE. of Carlsruhe. Its salt baths (90° to 98° F.) are beneficial for rheumatism, gout, paralysis, &c. The visitors exceed 7000 annually. Pop. 4000.

Wilderness, a region in Virginia, 2 miles S. of the Rapidan, covered with thicket, and memorable for the indecisive two days' battle fought here by Grant and Lee, May 5–6, 1864. The Union loss was 18,000, the Confederate 11,000.

Wilhelmshaven (Vilhelmshah'fen), the chief naval port of Germany, on the W. side of the entrance of the Bay of Jahde, 45 miles NW. of Bremen. Inaugurated by King William in 1869, it is now a fortress of the first rank, defended by out-lying forts and torpedoes, and, with its moles, basins, dry-docks, vast navy stores and workshops, has been a very costly creation—the massive buildings being erected on swampy ground. Water is furnished by artesian wells. A commercial harbour has been made to the south of and connected with the naval one. Pop. 35,000.

Wilhelmshöhe (Vilhelmshay'eh). See Cassel.

Wilkesbarre (Wilks'bar-rey), capital of Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, on the left bank of the N. branch of the Susquehanna, 18 miles SW. of Scranton. Lying in the picturesque Wyoming Valley (q.v.), it is famous for its mines of anthracite coal, and manufactures locomotives, railroad-cars, mining machinery, ropes, pottery, &c. Pop. (1870) 10,174 ; (1890) 37,718 ; (1910) 67,105.

Willamette. See Oregon.

Willemstad, capital of Curaçao (q.v.).

Willenhall, a town of Staffordshire, 3 miles E. of Wolverhampton. Pop. 19,000.

Willesden, a Middlesex suffragan see, WNW. of London. Pop. (urban district), 154,000.

Williamsburg, capital of James City county, Virginia, near the James River, 48 miles ESE. of Richmond. Here are William and Mary College (1693) and the Eastern State Lunatic Asylum. Founded in 1632, it was the colonial and state capital till 1779. McClellan took it after severe fighting, May 5–6, 1862. Pop. 2750.

Williamsport, capital of Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, on the west bank of the Susquehanna (here crossed by a suspension bridge), 93 miles N. of Harrisburg. Lying in the midst of attractive scenery, it is a popular summer-resort, but is chiefly notable as a great lumber mart. Pop. 32,000.

Willimantic, a borough of Connecticut, 31 miles by rail E. by S. of Hartford, with large cotton, silk, woollen, and tin factories, &c., driven by the Willimantic River, which here falls 100 feet in 1 mile. Pop. 11,500.

Willington Quay, a Northumberland port, on the Tyne, since 1910 part of Wallsend. Robert Stephenson was a native.

Williton, a small town of Somerset, 14 miles NW. of Taunton, with an Early English church. Pop. of parish, 1300.

Willoughby, a Lancashire parish, 3 miles SSE. of Alford. Captain John Smith was a native.

Wilmington, (1) a city and port of Delaware, on the Delaware River and Brandywine and Christiana Creeks, 25 miles SW. of Philadelphia. It is a regular town built on the slopes of a hill (240 feet), and contains a granite custom-house, town-hall, opera-house, the Wilmington Institute, Old Swedes' Church (1698), &c. Its manufactures include iron steamships, railway cars, engines, machinery, cottons, woollens, powder, leather, flour, matches, &c. Pop. (1880) 42,478 ; (1910) 87,411.—(2) Capital of New Hanover county, North Carolina, on the left bank of Cape Fear River, 30 miles from its mouth and 207 SSE. of Raleigh. It manufactures turpentine, rice, flour, and cottons. During the civil war it was a chief Confederate port, frequented by blockade-runners. Pop. (1880) 17,350 ; (1910) 25,748.

Wilmslow, a Cheshire town, on the Bollin, 5 miles SSW. of Stockport. Pop. 8150.

Wilna. See Vilno.

Wilton, a market-town of Wiltshire (q.v.) at the confluence of the Nadder and Wyly, feeders of the Avon, 3¼ miles WNW. of Salisbury. It was the capital of Wessex, and the seat of a bishopric (909–1050), but after 1244, when it had twelve churches, declined through the diversion of the great western road. The present church, erected in 1844 by Lord Herbert of Lea at a cost of £20,000, is an ornate Lombardic structure, with a campanile 108 feet high. On the site of a Saxon nunnery is Wilton House, the Herberts' seat, where Sidney wrote part of the Arcadia. It is famous for its Van Dycks and for the beauty of its grounds. Since Elizabeth's reign carpets have been manufactured at Wilton, which is a municipal borough, first chartered by Henry I., and reformed in 1885. It returned two members till 1832, then one till 1885. Pop. 2000. See James Smith's Wilton (Sal. 1851).

Wiltshire, an English county, bounded by Gloucestershire, Berks, Hants, Dorset, and Somerset. Its greatest length, N. to S., is 54 miles ; its greatest breadth, 37 ; and the area, 1354 sq. m., or 866,677 acres. Pop. (1801) 183,820 ; (1841) 256,280 ; (1911) 286,822. This unusually small proportion of inhabitants is due to the presence of extensive tracts of open pasture-land in the centre and north of the county—Salisbury Plain and the Marlborough Downs. The river systems divide near Devizes, whence the Somerset Avon, entering Wilts from Gloucester, flows to the Severn below Bristol ; the Hampshire Avon flows by Salisbury to the English Channel at Christchurch ; and the Kennet flows to join the Thames at Reading. Chalk occupies far the larger portion of the county, which culminates on the Berkshire border in Inkpen or Hackpen Beacon (972 feet). Iron ore was worked and smelted in remote antiquity, but of late only in the vicinity of Seend, and since of Westbury. The industries are chiefly agricultural—dairy-farming in the N., and grazing in the S. Large flocks of sheep feed on Salisbury Plain. Calne sends out much Wiltshire bacon. There is also an important manufacturing element—broadcloth at Bradford and Trowbridge, and Wilton carpets. Though the rolling open country is as a rule monotonous, there is much charming scenery in the valleys and broken hill districts ; Savernake Forest and Cranbourne Chace have hardly changed for centuries.

Wiltshire was settled by the Romans, and the defeat of the British at Old Sarum in 552 was the first important Saxon success. The victory at Barbury (556) included the shire in Wessex, of which kingdom Wilton became the capital. At Wilton Alfred suffered his first defeat from the Danes ; at Edington (Ethandune), near Westbury, he defeated Guthrum. Wilton—itself named from the river Wyly—gave name to the county as Wiltonscire. Waller's defeat at Roundway Hill, Devizes, and the gallant defence of Wardour Castle by Lady Arundell were the chief local episodes of the Great Rebellion. Till 1832 Wiltshire returned thirty-four members, till 1867 eighteen, then till 1885 fifteen, and now six only—five for county divisions and one for Salisbury. The municipalities are Calne, Chippenham, Devizes, Malmesbury, Marlborough, Salisbury, Swindon, and Wilton. For the archæologist Wilts excels every county in England, containing as it does Stonehenge, Avebury, Silbury Hill, innumerable barrows and earthworks, the most perfect Anglo-Saxon church in existence at Bradford-on-Avon, Salisbury Cathedral, Malmesbury Abbey, Longleat, &c. See works by Aubrey (ed. by Jackson, 1862), Hoare (8 vols. 1812–44), Britton (3 vols. 1801–25), Moody (1851), J. E. Jackson (2 vols. 1867–72), W. H. Smith (1884–85), and Worth (1887), besides the Wilts Archæological Magazine (since 1853).

Wim'bledon Common, an open, breezy heath of 628 acres, 7 miles SW. of London. Here from 1860 till 1889 in July was held the annual meeting of the National Rifle Association, since transferred to Bisley (q.v.). Linnæus here first saw the gorse in bloom; and here many duels were fought. Wimbledon now is practically a suburb of London. Pop. of borough, 55,000.

Wimborne, a town of Dorset, at the confluence of the Allen and Stour, 7 miles N. of Poole and 25½ E. of Dorchester. Here, about 705, was founded a nunnery, which Edward the Confessor refounded as a collegiate church—the noble cruciform minster, Norman to Perpendicular in style, with a central and a west tower, and the tomb of Ethelred I. There is a grammar-school (1496; refounded 1563). Coach-building and the manufacture of buttons and woollen hose give employment. Pop. of urban district, 3700. See works by Hall (1853) and Yeatman (1878).

Wincanton, a Somerset town, on the Cale, 5 miles SSE. of Bruton. Pop. of parish, 2000.

Winceby. See HORNCASTLE.

Winchcomb, a Gloucestershire market-town, on the Isborne, under the Cotswolds, 7 miles NE. of Cheltenham. Pop. of parish, 3000.

Win'chelsea, a decayed Cinque Port of Sussex, affiliated to Hastings, is 2 miles SW. of Rye by rail, and from 1832 to 1885 was included in the parliamentary borough of Rye. The present ancient city (pop. 700) is New Winchelsea. Old Winchelsea stood 3 miles SE., but was finally submerged by the sea in 1287. New Winchelsea was built on a quadrangular plan by Edward I. Parts of a Franciscan monastery and three of the gateways remain. See Inderwick's Story of New Winchelsea (1892).

Win'chester, the city of Hampshire, on the Itchen, 60 miles WSW. of London. It originated in a tribal settlement on the summit of a hill. As the settlers became more numerous they descended the slope (St Catherine's) to the plain, and here arose Caer Gwent, 'the White City.' The Romans took possession of the town, and formed its future rectangular plan. Alongside of the wattled huts of the 'Belgæ' soon grew up city walls, temples, a head college for flamens, &c.; and, if the record be true, the first Christian church in Britain was built here, 169 A.D. Tesselated pavements, &c. are preserved in the museum of the new guildhall, while the walls of Wolvesey are studded with Roman bricks and drums of columns. The Romans spelt the name Venta, the Saxons Wintanceastre. From the 8th till the 13th c. Winchester was a rival of London. In 635 an Italian monk, Birinus, here converted King Cynegils, whose son Cenwalk here built St Peter's basilica. Alfred the Great, educated here, resided during his long reign at Winchester, of which his tutor St Swithin was a native and afterwards bishop. Alfred also founded the 'New Monastery,' afterwards called from his favourite master, 'St Grimbalds.' After the king's death the monks by trickery obtained his body, and became also possessed of the bones of St Josse. But in Edgar's reign Bishop Æthelwold erected a magnificent cathedral, its chief attraction the body of St Swithin and the miracles it worked. William the Conqueror built a palace at Winchester, which so circumscribed the monks that they moved across to Hyde Mead, on the north-west of the city. This took place in 1110; in 1141 the abbey was destroyed by fire-balls from Wolvesey, when the fight raged for seven weeks in the heart of the city. The monastery was soon afterwards rebuilt, and in 1390 its abbot was mitred. In 1788 a bridewell was constructed out of the ruins. Beneath the east window lie the bones of five persons found here in 1867, and supposed to be those of King Alfred, his queen, two sons, and St Grimbald. Henry III. ('of Winchester') was born in the castle, which had a Mappa Mundi and Wheel of Fortune—the latter perhaps 'Arthur's Round Table,' which now hangs in the hall. The castle had become much dilapidated before the Cavaliers took refuge here—soon to surrender to Waller. The city and castle were retaken by the royalists, but finally yielded to Cromwell in 1645. One tower of the castle remains, with the fine hall 110 feet long. For 400 years parliaments occasionally sat in it, and now it is a law-court. Hard by is Charles II.'s red brick palace, now a barrack (largely destroyed by fire in December 1894). The Saxon cathedral was rebuilt in 1079–93. Its central tower fell in 1107, but was soon rebuilt; and it still forms the substantial part of the present cathedral, which owes its existing form to Bishops de Lucy, Edington, Wykeham, Cardinal Beaufort, and Waynefiete. Specially interesting are the monuments and unrivalled chantries. In the centre of the choir stands an ancient tomb, said to be that of Rufus; here too are buried Bishops de Lucy, De la Roche, Edington, Wykeham, Cardinal Beaufort, Wayneflete, Langton, Fox, and Gardiner, as also Jane Austen and Izaak Walton. The remains of the Saxon kings and bishops are perched in coffers on the choir partition walls. Important repairs, including the underpinning of the fabric, were carried out in 1906–12.

In 1369–93 Winchester College was founded by William of Wykeham. His edifice is that now existing, except the chantry chapel, schoolroom, and tower. At the entrance of the kitchen stands the picture of the Trusty Servant. The hall is magnificent, 53 feet long. In the schoolroom, built by Warden Nicholas (1687), stands the celebrated signboard painting (c. 1450), informing the schoolboy that he must learn, leave, or be flogged. There were always some boys who were not on the foundation, and as they increased 'Old Commoners' was built in 1730. The number of boys is now about 450. Among former Wykamists have been Archbishops Warham and Howley, Sir Thomas Browne, Bishop Ken, the poets Collins, Warton, Young, Otway, and Bowles, Lowth, Lemprière, Dr Arnold of Rugby, Sydney Smith, and Lord Sherbrooke. There are two hospitals dedicated to St John, and said to have been founded by Birinus; one has been rebuilt, the other has a fine hall belonging to the corporation. Portions of the city wall, mostly built in the reigns of John and Henry III., remain, and two of the gates. Several of the town houses are ancient; the Butter Cross dates from Henry VI.; and close to it an old clock projects over the High Street in front of the former guildhall. The city once extended to St Cross, Weeke, Worthy, and Magdalen Hill, and in the reign of Henry I. had 20,000 inhabitants, but declined so much after being sacked in 1265 that it has but now regained that amount, the pop. being 13,704 in 1851, and 23,378 in 1911. A free library was established in 1877. A mile distant stands the interesting hospital of St Cross, founded in 1132 by De Blois, but almost wholly rebuilt by Cardinal Beaufort.

Winchester, capital of Frederick county, Virginia, in the valley of the Shenandoah, 87 miles WNW. of Washington. Pop. 6000.

Windau (Vin-dow), a Russian seaport in Courland, 120 miles NE. of Memel. Pop. 7094.

Win'dermere, or WINANDERMERE, the largest lake in England, called from its beauty 'Queen of the Lakes,' is partly in Lancashire, and partly divides it from Westmorland. It is 10½ miles long, not quite 1 mile in extreme breadth; and, lying 134 feet above sea-level, discharges its surplus waters southward into Morecambe Bay by the Leven. Next to Wast Water, Windermere is the deepest of all the English lakes, its greatest depth being 219 feet, while Wast Water is 258 feet deep. It contains a number of islands, the largest being 28 acres in area. Soft rich beauty is the main feature of the lake; there being a total absence of that sublimity which characterises some of the other lakes, except at the north end, where Langdale Pikes, Harrison Stickle, Sca Fell, and Bow Fell stand forward prominently. Windermere village (pop. 5000), nearly a mile from the E. shore, and 300 feet above its level, has a railway station.

Windlesham, a Surrey urban district, 8 miles WSW. of Chertsey. Pop. 4300.

Windrush, a river of Gloucester and Oxford shires, flowing 30 miles to the Thames.

Windsor, a town of Berkshire, on the right bank of the Thames, opposite Eton, 21¼ miles W. by S. of London by rail, 43 by river. The kings before the Conquest appear to have had a hunting-lodge here; but the present stately royal castle is all of post-Conquest erection, owing much to Henry II., Henry III., Edward III. (the Round Tower), Edward IV., and Henry VII. (St George's Chapel), Charles II., and George IV., under whom Wyatville transformed the building. It was the birthplace of Edward III. and Henry VI., the deathplace of George III., George IV., William IV., and Prince Albert; and the burial-place of Henry VI., Edward IV., Henry VIII., Charles I., the Duke of Clarence, &c. John was at Windsor after the granting of Magna Charta; and Edward III. established the Order of the Garter here. As we see it now Windsor Castle consists of an Upper and a Lower Ward, between which are the Mound and the Round Tower. In the Upper or eastern Ward are the Library, state apartments, Long Corridor, and private apartments. Wyatville ingeniously connected all the isolated towers and the curtain wall between by means of this corridor, which is 520 feet in length. The state apartments contain many good pictures and other works of art. In the Lower Ward is St George's Chapel, with its cloisters, the Deanery, and the Canons' Houses. The last named contain remains of the palace of Henry III. Adjoining to the westward are the Horseshoe Cloisters. Next to them are the barracks, including the Curfew Tower, built by Salvin. On the south side is the principal gate, called after Henry VIII. In a line with it are the houses of the Military Knights, a band of pensioners. The Round Tower is the residence of the constable, and from it floats the royal standard. Wyatville lived, till his death in 1840, in the Winchester Tower, called after William of Wykeham. Wyatville made Windsor what it is, and, though we may find fault with his details, his proportions and his eye for a grand scenic effect place him far ahead of any other architect of the so-called Gothic revival.

The town of New Windsor was chartered by Edward I. It contains some interesting old houses, but nothing that can with certainty be assigned to the days of Shakespeare's Merry Wives. Sir C. Wren, who was M.P. for the borough in 1688, built the town-hall in the market-place. The town is pleasantly situated close to the Home Park and the famous Long Walk, an avenue of elms 3 miles long, which leads to the Great Park. East of the Long Walk are the tombs of the Duchess of Kent and of the Prince Consort, in domed chapels; also Frogmore, the royal gardens, the farm and the dairy. The Great Park contains a church, Cumberland Lodge, and Virginia Water (q.v.). Since 1867 Windsor has returned only one member. Pop. 12,600.

Windsor, a port of Nova Scotia, 45 miles NW. of Halifax, with King's College (1788). Pop. 3500.

Windsor, a town and port of Ontario, Canada, on the Detroit River, opposite Detroit. Pop. (1881) 4253; (1901) 12,153; (1911) 17,829.

Win'nipeg, capital of the Canadian province of Manitoba, stands at the confluence of the Assiniboine with the Red River, 1300 miles W. of Ottawa and 1500 E. of Vancouver. Formerly Fort Garry, a post of the Hudson Bay Company, it was incorporated as Winnipeg in 1873. It is the commercial capital of central Canada and the greatest grain market of the British empire; and has government offices, city hall, a fine hospital, the university of Manitoba, great flour-mills and grain-elevators, the shops of the two Canadian Pacific railways and of the Canadian Northern. Pop. (1871) 241; (1881) 7985; (1901) 42,340; (1911) 136,035.

Winnipeg, LAKE, in Manitoba, 40 miles N. of Winnipeg city, and 650 feet above sea-level, is 280 miles long, 57 miles broad, and 8500 sq. m. in area. Its largest tributaries are the Saskatchewan, the Winnipeg, and the Red River of the North; its outlet is the Nelson River.

Wino'na, Minnesota, on the right bank of the Mississippi, 103 miles SE. of St Paul, with mills, foundries, carriage, barrel, and sash factories. Pop. 19,000.

Winsford, a town of Cheshire, 6 miles S. of Northwich, with saltworks. Pop. 11,000.

Winslow, a market-town of Bucks, 6½ miles SE. of Buckingham. Pop. 1700.

Winster, a Derbyshire village, 4 miles W. by N. of Matlock. Pop. 790.

Winston, a town of North Carolina, 218 miles SW. of Richmond, Virginia, with tobacco-factories. Pop. 17,000.

Winterslow, a Wiltshire parish, 6 miles ENE. of Salisbury, with many memories of Hazlitt.

Winterthur (Vin-ter-toor; anc. Vitodurum), a Swiss town, 17 miles NE. of Zurich. It manufactures locomotives and textiles. Pop. 25,700.

Winterton, a Lincolnshire town, 9 miles NNE. of Brigg. Pop. 1400.

Wirksworth, a market-town, 13¼ miles NNW. of Derby, with manufactures of cotton, ginghams, and hosiery. There are lead-mines near. Pop. 3900.

Wirral. See CHESHIRE.

Wis'bech, a market-town of Cambridgeshire, in the Isle of Ely, on the Nene, 21 miles ENE. of Peterborough, 13 SW. of Lynn, and 40 N. of Cambridge. The parish church, Norman to Perpendicular in style, has a fine tower; and there are a corn exchange (1811), a cattle-market (1869), a town-hall (1873), the Cambridgeshire hospital (1873), a museum and literary institute, and a public park of 18 acres. A castle, founded by the Conqueror in 1071, was rebuilt by Bishop Morton in 1483, restored by Bishop Andrewes in 1617, and again rebuilt from Inigo Jones's designs by Thurloe, Cromwell's secretary, but was demolished in 1816. Visited by King John and Edward IV., it was the prison under Elizabeth of many Catholic recusants. Godwin was a native, and Clarkson, to whose memory a Gothic cross by Sir G. G. Scott was erected in 1881. Vessels of nearly 500 tons can now ascend the Nene from the Wash, a distance of 7 miles; and Wisbech has a considerable export of cereals and import of timber, with some manufactures of iron, oil, ropes, &c. It was made a municipal borough in Edward VI.'s reign. Population, 11,000. See works by W. Watson (1827), S. H. Miller (1878), and T. G. Law (1890).

Wisby (Viz-by), a once famous seaport on the west coast of the Swedish island of Gothland, 130 miles S. of Stockholm. One of the chief commercial cities in Europe during the 10th and 11th centuries, and then a principal factory of the Hanseatic League, in 1361 it was stormed by Valdemar III. of Denmark, who obtained an immense booty. This was a fatal blow to its prosperity. The ancient walls and towers, almost as entire as in the 13th c., render its appearance from the sea most striking. Pop. 10,000.

Wiscon'sin, one of the United States, lies between Lakes Michigan and Superior and the Mississippi River, with its tributary the St Croix; the surrounding states are Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, and Illinois. Its length is about 300 miles and its breadth 250, with an area of 56,040 sq. m. The surface is a rolling plain with an elevation of 600 feet, rising to 1800 feet at the divide, about 30 miles south of Lake Superior. The general slope is south-westward towards the Mississippi, to which flow four-fifths of the streams—the Wisconsin (600 miles), Chippewa, Black, &c. There are two thousand small lakes, the largest, Winnebago (28 × 10 miles). Dense forests once covered most of the state, though the southern part is prairie land. The chief industry is agriculture, employing 600,000 persons. Dairying is rapidly progressing, and lumbering, the manufacture of leather, foundry and machine-shop products, flour, malt liquors, and slaughtering and meat-packing are great industries. The state suffered from destructive forest fires in 1871 and 1894; in the former 1000 lives were lost. The University of Wisconsin is in Madison, the state capital; the chief commercial city is Milwaukee (373,850). Artificial earth-mounds are the earliest human traces. In 1665 a Jesuit mission was founded on Green Bay, and French fur-traders soon established trading-posts. Upon the conquest of Canada in 1763 Wisconsin passed under British control, which lasted practically till 1815. Wisconsin Territory, when formed in 1836, extended to the Dakotas; but in 1838 the Mississippi was made its western boundary. In 1848 it was admitted as a state. Pop. (1850) 305,391; (1880) 1,315,477; (1900) 2,069,042; (1910) 2,333,860, of whom upwards of 510,000 were foreign born.

Wish'aw, a thriving town of Lanarkshire, 3½ miles ESE. of Motherwell and 15 of Glasgow. Founded in 1794, it was constituted a police-burgh in 1855, and since 1874 has comprised also the villages of Cambusnethan (Lockhart's birthplace) and Craigneuk. Coal-mining is the staple industry, and there are also ironworks. Pop. (1841) 2149; (1881) 13,112; (1911) 25,263.

Wiske, a river in the North Riding of Yorkshire, flowing 24 miles to the Swale.

Wismar (w as v), a Baltic seaport of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 20 miles by rail N. of Schwerin. Of the walls only four gates remain; but its quaint houses are a feature of the place, and several of the brick churches, as well as the Fürstenhof, once a ducal residence, date from the 14th or 15th century. Pop. 25,000.

Wissembourg (Veessan^gboorg; Ger. Weissenburg), till 1871 a French fortified town, close to the frontier of the Bavarian Palatinate, now a manufacturing town in German Lower Alsace, is on the Lauter 42 miles NNE. of Strasburg; pop. 7000. It grew up round a 7th-century Benedictine abbey, and in 1677–97 was ceded to France. Here, on 4th August 1870, the Germans won their first great victory over the French.

Wiston, one of the Pembroke (q.v.) boroughs, 5½ miles NE. of Haverfordwest. Pop. 640.

Witham, (1) an Essex town, 8 miles NE. of Chelmsford. Pop. of parish, 3500.—(2) A river of Rutland and Lincolnshire, flowing 80 miles to the Wash, past Grantham, Lincoln, and Boston.

Withernsea, a watering-place in the East Riding of Yorkshire, 4 miles NE. of Patrington.

Withington, a S. suburb of Manchester.

Witney, a town of Oxfordshire, on the Windrush, 11 miles W. by N. of Oxford (14 by a branch-line, 1861). It has a three-arch bridge (1822), a fine cruciform 13th-century church, a staple or blanket hall (1721), a market-cross (1683), a town-hall (1863), a corn exchange (1862), and a county court-house (1859). Its blankets enjoy a great reputation; other woollens are also made, and glove-making is carried on. Pop. 3500. See J. A. Giles's History of Witney (1852).

Witten, a Prussian town of Westphalia, on the Ruhr, 7 miles SE. of Bochum. Pop. 37,500.

Wittenberg (w as v), in Prussian Saxony, capital of the old electorate of Saxony, and cradle of the Reformation, on the Elbe, 59 miles SW. of Berlin. The famous university (1502), where Luther was professor and Hamlet studied, was in 1815 incorporated with that of Halle. In the Stadt-Kirche are two remarkable pictures by Cranach, of Melanchthon baptising, and Luther preaching. In the Schloss-Kirche (1499) are the tombs of Luther and Melanchthon, as well as those of Frederick the Wise (with a noble bronze statue by Vischer) and John the Steadfast, electors of Saxony. Luther nailed his theses to its wooden door, which, burned by the Austrian besiegers in 1760 during the Seven Years' War, was in 1858 replaced by one of bronze. The Schloss-Kirche was restored and reopened by the German emperor on 31st October 1892. The Augustinian monastery, with Luther's cell, was converted in 1817 into a theological seminary; the house of the great Reformer, containing his chair, table, &c., and two portraits of him by Cranach, remains almost unaltered. In the market-place is Schadow's bronze statue of Luther (1822), not far from it Drake's of Melanchthon (1865). Occupied by the French in 1813, it was stormed by the Prussians in 1814, and next year became Prussian. There are manufactures of woollen and linen goods, hosiery, leather, brandy, and beer. Pop. 22,400.

Wittenberge, a Prussian town on the Elbe, 65 miles NW. of Potsdam. Pop. 20,600.

Witu (Veetoo), a small territory on the east coast of Africa, German in 1886–90, and since included in British East Africa.

Witwat'ersrand. See JOHANNESBURG.

Wiveliscombe (locally Wilscombe), a Somerset town, 9½ miles W. of Taunton. Pop. 1300.

Wivenhoe, an Essex town, on the Colne, 4 miles SE. of Colchester. Pop. 2400.

Woburn, a market-town (pop. 1100), 13 miles SW. of Bedford, noted chiefly for Woburn Abbey, seat of the Dukes of Bedford, which stands in a park 12 miles in circumference. The Cistercian abbey, a daughter house of Fountains, was founded in 1145, and in 1547 granted to John, Earl Russell, afterwards Duke of Bedford. The mansion (mainly 18th c.) contains a magnificent collection of portraits. At Woburn is a great agricultural experimental station. See also WOOBURN.

Woburn, a town of Massachusetts, 10 miles by rail NNW. of Boston, with manufactures of pianos, shoes, leather, &c. Pop. 15,300.

Woking, a Surrey town, 24 miles SW. of London by rail. Nearly 3 miles W., at Brookwood, is the 'London Necropolis Cemetery' (1864), with the first public crematory in England (1878). Pop. of urb. dist. 25,000. See BISLEY.

Wo'kingham, or OAKINGHAM, a municipal bor. of Berkshire (till 1832 Wiltshire, detached), in Windsor Forest, 7 miles SE. of Reading by rail. Incorporated in 1885, it has a Gothic town-hall (1860), neighbouring paper, saw, and flour mills, and the 'Rose' inn, where Gay, Swift, Pope, and Arbuthnot celebrated the host's pretty daughter in the ballad of 'Molly Mog.' It was famous for its bull-baitings till 1821. Bearwood, 1 mile W., is the seat of J. Walter, Esq., of the Times. Pop. 4400.

Wolds. See LINCOLNSHIRE, YORKSHIRE.

Wolfenbüttel (Volfenbeett'el), a town of Brunswick, founded in 1046, on the Oker, 7 miles S. of Brunswick by rail. One of the old churches contains many of the tombs of the princes of Brunswick. The old castle accommodates a seminary for teachers and a theatre. The library opposite (1723), of which Lessing was librarian, had to be taken down and rebuilt in 1887; it houses 300,000 volumes (including 800 Bibles and many incunabula) and 10,000 MSS. There are manufactures of machines, copper goods, flax, cloth, corks, leather, preserves, tobacco, &c. Pop. 20,000.

Wolf Rock, 8 miles SSW. of Land's End, has a lighthouse (1862–69) 116½ feet high.

Wolgast (w as v), a Pomeranian seaport, on the Peene, 10 miles from its mouth in the Baltic, and 36 SE. of Stralsund by rail. Pop. 10,000.

Wollongong, a seaport of New South Wales, 49 miles S. of Sydney by rail. Pop. 5000.

Wolsingham, a Durham town, on the Wear, 10 miles NW. of Bishop Auckland. Pop. 3400.

Wolstanton, a western residential suburb of Burslem (q.v.), Staffordshire.

Wolverhampton (Wol- as Wool'-), a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough, the 'metropolis of the Black Country,' stands on a gentle eminence amid a network of railways and canals, 13 miles NW. of Birmingham, 15 S. of Stafford, and 126 NW. of London. It was first called 'Hamton,' and then 'Wulfrunishamton,' after Wulfruna, King Edgar's sister, had founded in 996 St Peter's Church, which continued collegiate till 1846. Rebuilt during the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries, and enlarged and elaborately restored in 1859–65 at a cost of £10,000, that church is a fine cruciform Gothic edifice, with a rude stone cross in the churchyard, a carved stone pulpit of 1480, and monuments to Admiral Sir Richard Leveson (1570–1605) and Colonel Lane (d. 1667), who assisted Charles II. in his escape from Worcester. Otherwise the public buildings are all modern—the town-hall (1868), in the Italian style, corn exchange (1853), market-hall (1853), agricultural hall (1863), hospital (1849), post-office (1873), art gallery (1885), drill-hall (1886), &c. A bronze equestrian statue of the Prince Consort was inaugurated by Queen Victoria in 1866; and there is also a statue (1879) of the Right Hon. C. P. Villiers of Corn-law fame, first returned as M.P. for Wolverhampton in 1835, and re-elected in 1892. The public park (1881) was laid out at a cost of £16,000. The free grammar-school, which was founded in 1512 by Sir Stephen Jenyns, Lord Mayor of London, and at which Abernethy and Sir W. Congreve were educated, occupies handsome new buildings of 1876; and there are also a blue-coat school (1710) and an orphanage (1850). Sir Stephen was a native; so too was the great Mr Jonathan Wild. Bishop Pococke described Wolverhampton in 1757 as 'a great manufacturing town in all sorts of toys, and particularly of locks in the greatest perfection;' and locks—some two million yearly—are still its specialty, the Messrs Chubb's works being here. The other manufactures include tinplate, japanned goods, enamelled hollow wares, edge tools, gas and water tubes, electro-plate, cycles, and zinc goods. The town stands on the western edge of the great coal and iron mining district of South Staffordshire, so that the vicinity on the south and east is all covered with collieries, ironstone mines, blast-furnaces, forges, iron-foundries, and rolling-mills, whilst on the north and west there is pleasant green country—Boscobel (q.v.) is only 8 miles distant. Wolverhampton was enfranchised in 1832, returning two members to parliament (three since 1885), and it was made a municipal borough in 1848, a county borough in 1888. The Wednesday market is held under a charter of 1258. Pop. of parliamentary borough (1851) 119,748; (1881) 164,334; (1911) 202,087, of whom 95,328 were within the municipal and county borough. See works by G. Oliver (1836), F. Hall (1865), Steen (1871), and J. Fullwood (1880).

Wolverton, a town of Bucks, 2 miles ENE. of Stony Stratford. It has the London and North-western railway shops. Pop. of parish, 7400.

Wombwell, a town of Yorkshire, 4½ miles SE. of Barnsley. Pop. 17,500.

Wooburn, a town of Bucks, 2¾ miles SW. of Beaconsfield. Pop. of parish, 4000.

Wood'bridge, a Suffolk town, on the right bank of the Deben, which expands into an estuary, 12 miles from the sea and 8 ENE. of Ipswich. The Udebryge of Domesday, it has a fine Perpendicular church with a flint-work tower 108 feet high, a Flemish-looking town-hall, and the richly endowed Seckford almshouses and grammar-school—the former dating from 1587, and rebuilt in 1840 at a cost of £28,000. Bernard Barton and Edward FitzGerald were residents. Vessels of 140 tons can reach the town, which exports corn, malt, and bricks. Pop. 4600.

Woodford, an Essex urban district, 4½ miles N. by E. of Stratford. Pop. 20,000.

Woodhall Spa. See HORNCASTLE.

Woodside, a NW. suburb of Aberdeen.

Wood'stock, a market-town of Oxfordshire, on the Glyme, 8 miles NNW. of Oxford. It was a royal manor from Saxon times until 1705, when it was granted to the Duke of Marlborough, whose seat, Blenheim Park (q.v.), is close by. Hence it has many memories, as the birthplace of the Black Prince (though not of Chaucer), as the scene of Becket's first quarrel with Henry (if not of Fair Rosamond's murder), as the place of captivity where Elizabeth wished herself a milkmaid, and for the pranks of its 'merry devil' on the parliamentary commissioners in the old manor house, which was pulled down in 1723. A municipal borough, chartered first by Henry VI., and last in 1886, Woodstock till 1832 returned two members, and then till 1885 one. It still carries on leather glove-making. Pop. 1600. See a work by E. Marshall (2 vols. 1873–74).

Woodstock, a town of Ontario, on the Thames, 88 miles by rail SW. of Toronto. Pop. 9500.

Wooler, a town of Northumberland, under the Cheviots, 9 miles SW. of Belford. Pop. 1500.

Woolmer Forest, a heathy tract on the borders of Hants and Sussex.

Woolsthorpe, a Lincolnshire hamlet, 8 miles S. of Grantham, with the birthplace (almost unaltered) of Sir Isaac Newton.

Woolton. See MUCH WOOLTON.

Woolwich (Wool'litch), a parish in Kent (county of London), and part of Eltham royal manor, on the Thames, 9 miles below London Bridge, was in 1885 constituted a parliamentary borough returning one member. It includes the three parishes of Woolwich, Plumstead, and Eltham, and is now one of the metropolitan boroughs of the county of London. Pop. (1911) 121,376. The chief part of the town lies south of the river, but North Woolwich (part of the River ward) is on the north side. The Royal Arsenal dates from 1585, when Queen Elizabeth had a store of arms and armour at the Tower House, a mansion in Woolwich Warren adjoining the then boggy and unhealthy marshes of Plumstead. Prince Rupert protected the King's Warren with batteries in Charles II.'s reign, and other fortifications were added by James II. In 1716 the proof of ordnance was transferred from Moorfields to Woolwich, guns began to be cast there, carriages constructed, and powder stored. From these works grew the three great departments of the Royal Arsenal—the Royal Gun Factories, Royal Carriage Department, and Royal Laboratory. After 1805 the ground covered by these works quickly extended to some 300 acres. Guns of all sizes, every form of military wagon, shot, shell, torpedoes, cartridges, bullets, rockets, tubes, and fuses, have since always been produced there, small-arms being made at Birmingham and Enfield, and powder, gun-cotton, and other explosives at Waltham. The barracks are very imposing buildings. The Herbert Hospital, built soon after the Crimean war at the south end of Woolwich Common, is one of the largest military hospitals in Britain. The common itself, nearly half a square mile in extent, forms an excellent drill-ground. At its south-west corner there is a hut camp for two field batteries, and opposite to it the handsome buildings of the Royal Military Academy. This, the oldest military school in the kingdom, dates from 1741. The Royal Military Academy was built in 1801. In 1869 the Royal Dockyard at Woolwich, long the chief one in the kingdom, was closed; but it continues to be used as a military store depot. The Great Harry was built there in 1562, the Royal George in 1751, the Galatea in 1859, and more than 200 other ships. At the north-west end of the common are the Repository and the Rotunda Museum of military antiquities. St George's Garrison Church (1863) is one of the few conspicuous buildings in the town. Woolwich, among whose sons have been Lovelace and General Gordon, has gradually become a suburb of London. Plumstead on the east, with its common and marshes, is in the borough of Woolwich.

Woonsock'et, a town of Rhode Island, on the Blackstone River, 38 miles SW. of Boston, with manufactures of cottons, woollens, iron, and rubber. Pop. 40,000.

Wooster, a town of Ohio, on Killbuck Creek, 135 miles W. by N. of Pittsburgh, with a Presbyterian university (1866). Pop. 6000.

Wootton Bassett, a market-town of Wilts, 6 miles W. of Swindon. It returned two members till 1832. Pop. of parish, 2000.

Worcester (Woos'ter), the county town of Worcestershire, 27½ miles by rail SW. of Birmingham, 65½ NNE. of Bristol, and 121 (by road 111) WNW. of London. It stands on the left bank of the Severn, here crossed by a five-arch stone bridge (1781–1841), 270 feet long. Previously perhaps a station of the Romans, Wigornaceaster became in 679 the seat of a Mercian bishopric, whose cathedral is Worcester's chief glory. It is a double cross in plan, 410 feet long, 126 wide across the west transept, and 60 to 67 high, with a central tower of 196 feet. Rebuilt from 1084 onwards, and restored since 1857 at a cost of £100,000, it is mainly Early English and Decorated in style, but retains a very interesting Norman crypt. The simplicity, if not plainness, of the exterior is amply compensated by the fine perspective of the lofty groined roof, and the general noble effect of the interior. One may specially notice the columns of Purbeck marble, the 14th-century choir-stalls and misereres, the elaborate modern reredos, the circular chapter-house, the splendid peal of twelve bells, and the tombs of King John, Prince Arthur, Lord Lyttelton, the Earl of Dudley, and (in the cloisters) 'Miserrimus,' a not very wretched Nonjuror. At Worcester, alternately with Hereford and Gloucester, are held the festivals of the 'Three Choirs.' The old episcopal palace is now the deanery, the present palace since 1842 being Hartlebury Castle, 11 miles N.; and the cathedral school (1541) occupies the superb 13th-century refectory of a Benedictine priory. There is also Queen Elizabeth's school (1561). Nothing remains of the castle, and the Guesten Hall was ruthlessly pulled down in 1860; but there are a fine hall called the Commandery, a gatehouse ('Edgar's Tower'), and a good many old timbered houses, while of public buildings may be noticed the guildhall (1723), the shire-hall (1835), and the museum and free library (1836–79). Worcester is the seat of the Royal Porcelain Works, dating from 1751, and covering 5 acres, the glove-manufactory of Messrs Dent (a Glovers' Company was incorporated in 1497), and the 'Worcester Sauce' factory of Lea & Perrins; besides great nurseries and manufactories of cider, perry, and vinegar, chemicals, &c. In the neighbourhood are hop-yards. Worcester is a municipal borough, chartered by Richard I. in 1189; a parliamentary borough, returning only one member since 1885; and also, since 1888, a county borough. Pop. (1851) 27,528; (1881) 38,270; (1911) 49,982. Worcester was the scene of numberless sieges from the time of the Danes down to the 'crowning mercy' of Cromwell, when, on 3d September 1651, he routed Charles II., killing 4000 and making 7000 prisoners. Charles afterwards commemorated Worcester's loyalty by granting it the motto of 'Civitas fidelis.' Natives have been the alchemist Kelly, Lord Somers, and Mrs Henry Wood; whilst among the eighty and more bishops have been St Dunstan, St Oswald, St Wulfstan, Cantilupe, Latimer, Whitgift, Gauden, Stillingfleet, Hough, Hurd, and Perowne. See works by Abingdon (1717), Thomas (1737), Wild (1823), Britton (1835), Prof. Willis (Journal Archæol. Inst., vol. xx.), Walcott (1866), Noake (1866), and J. G. Smith and Onslow (1883).

Worcester (Wooster or Woorster), the second city of Massachusetts, on Blackstone River, 44 miles WSW. of Boston. Several suburban villages are included within the 36 sq. m. of the municipality. 'The Academic City' contains the state normal school, two state lunatic asylums, a military institute, high school, Jesuit college, Baptist academy, a large women's school, &c. Its churches include many handsome buildings, and from the porch of the Old South Church the Declaration of Independence was first read in Massachusetts. It manufactures wire, boots and shoes, iron products, and woollens. Pop. (1880) 58,291; (1900) 118,421; (1910) 145,986.

Worcester, capital of a wine-growing district in the Cape Province, 60 miles ENE. of Capetown. Pop. 8300.

Worcestershire (Woo'stershir), an inland English county of very irregular outline, bounded by the counties of Salop, Stafford, Warwick, Oxford, Gloucester, and Hereford. Its extreme length N. to S. is 50 miles, its greatest breadth 26 miles, and its area 716 sq. m., or 458,352 acres. Pop. (1801) 146,445; (1851) 276,926; (1881) 380,283; (1911) 387,688. The Severn is the chief river, and is navigable throughout the county from Bewdley to Tewkesbury, passing by the city of Worcester. The Avon, which enters Worcestershire near Cleeve, and passes by Evesham and Pershore, falling into the Severn at Tewkesbury, is also navigable. The other rivers are mostly feeders of these two—the Stour, Salwarp, and Teme of the Severn, and the Arrow of the Avon. A small portion of the north-east corner of the shire lies in the basin of the Trent. The canals were of great importance before the development of the railway system. The surface of the shire is diversified and picturesque. The chief hill range is that of the Malverns (1440 feet), on the border next Hereford; the Coteswolds stretch between Worcester and Gloucester; the Clents command part of the Warwick and Stafford frontier, chiefly of the 'Black Country;' the Lickey range is more central. The Clee Hills lie well to the north-west in Shropshire, but high broken ground stretches thence to the verge of Worcestershire in the romantic forest of Wyre. As a whole Worcestershire is a highly fertile agricultural region, with upland sheep-walks, productive tillage ground, and a very extensive fruit-growing area. Plums, pears, and apples are grown in enormous quantities, the neighbourhood of Pershore being the chief plum-growing centre in the kingdom. The more northern districts are, however, chiefly engaged in manufacture. Salt has been raised from the brine-springs at Droitwich (fed by immense beds of rock-salt) certainly for more than 1000 years. The manufacture of iron, carried on by the Romans, has developed into the busy industries of the unlovely 'Black Country,' of which Dudley is the chief centre. Other industries are the fireclay goods of Stourbridge, the glass wares produced there and at Stourport, the famous porcelain-works and the gloving of Worcester, and the carpet-weaving of Kidderminster.

Worcestershire contains the battlefields of Evesham, Tewkesbury, and Worcester; some of the most active participators in the Gunpowder Plot were associated with it. Before 1832 the shire had nine members; Dudley and Kidderminster were then enfranchised, and the total increased to twelve; at present there are eight, one each for five county divisions, and for Worcester, Dudley, and Kidderminster. Worcester and Dudley are county boroughs, and the other municipalities are Bewdley, Droitwich, Evesham, and Kidderminster. Of Worcestershire worthies may be mentioned Sir Thomas Littleton, Bishop Bonner, Samuel Butler, Thomas Blount, Archbishop Sheldon, Baskerville, Lord Lyttelton, Foote, Warren Hastings, Huskisson, Sir Rowland Hill, and Elgar. See works by Nash (1781–99), J. Chambers (worthies, 1820), Sir C. Hastings (nat. hist. 1834), Roberts (geology, 1860), Lees (botany, 1867), Noake (1868 and 1877), Niven (old houses, 1873), Worth (1889), and the 'Victoria History.'

Work'ington, a municipal borough and seaport of Cumberland, at the mouth of the Derwent, 7 miles N. of Whitehaven by rail. Its harbour, sheltered by a breakwater (1873), is safe and commodious. To neighbouring coal-mines the town owes its prosperity; there are ironworks, cycle and motor works, paper-mills, and shipbuilding yards. The salmon-fishery near is important. Mary, Queen of Scots, landed here, on her flight from Langside, 16th May 1568, and was entertained at Workington Hall (the seat of the Curwens since about 1160). Workington was incorporated as a municipal borough in 1888. It has a technical college (1913). Pop. (1881) 14,109; (1901) 26,143; (1911) 25,092.

Work'sop, a town of Nottinghamshire, on the river Ryton and the Chesterfield Canal, 16 miles ESE. of Sheffield and 23 N. of Nottingham. It lies near the northern extremity of Sherwood Forest (q.v.), in a district known as the 'Dukery,' from the number of ducal seats. There is Worksop Manor, in whose predecessor (destroyed by fire in 1761) Mary, Queen of Scots, was a prisoner under the Earl of Shrewsbury, and which, formerly a seat of the Duke of Norfolk, was purchased in 1840 for £350,000 by the Duke of Newcastle. His, too, is Clumber Park (q.v.), and there are also Welbeck Abbey (q.v., Duke of Portland) and Thoresby Park (till 1773 Duke of Kingston, now Earl Manvers). Worksop church was that of an Augustinian priory (1103), of which there is also a Decorated gateway; but a Norman keep has vanished. Modern buildings are the corn exchange (1854) and the Mechanics' Institute (1852). Malting is the chief industry, with brass and iron founding, and manufactures of chemicals, agricultural implements, and chairs. Pop. (1851) 7058; (1911) 20,387. See works by Holland (1726), White (1875), Sissons (1888).

Worms (Wurmz; Ger. pron. Vorms), an ancient and interesting town of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the Rhine's left bank, 25 miles SW. of Darmstadt. The massive Romanesque cathedral, with two cupolas and four towers, was founded in the 8th, rebuilt in the 11th and 12th centuries, and carefully restored in the last quarter of the 19th century. On a hill near the church called the Liebfrauenkirche a highly esteemed wine, Liebfrauenmilch, is grown. The synagogue (11th c.) is one of the oldest in Germany. The town-house was restored in 1885. There are manufactures of polished leather, tobacco, soap, &c. Pop. (1875) 16,597; (1910) 46,821. Worms is one of the oldest cities of Germany; in it is laid the scene of the Nibelungenlied. It was occupied by the Romans, destroyed by Attila, and afterwards rebuilt by Clovis. It was frequently the residence of Charlemagne and his Carlovingian successors, and was erected into a free imperial city by the Emperor Henry V. The most famous diet held here was that in 1521, at which Luther defended himself before Charles V., commemorated by an imposing Luther monument erected in 1868. The industry of Worms was great during the middle ages, and its population in the days of the Hohenstaufens averaged 60,000, and amounted to 30,000 even at the close of the Thirty Years' War; but it was almost wholly destroyed by the French in 1689.

Wormwood Scrubs, a district with a common, a railway station, and a prison, on the western outskirts of London, nearly 3 miles NW. of the Marble Arch in Hyde Park.

Worsborough, a town in the West Riding, 2½ miles S. of Barnsley, with manufactures of iron, glass, paper, gunpowder, &c. Pop. 13,000.

Worstead, a Norfolk parish, 3 miles SSE. of North Walsham. Worsted stuffs are said to derive their name hence.

Wörth (nearly Virt or Vairt), a village (pop. 1064) of Alsace, 10 miles SW. of Wissembourg (Weissenburg). The great German victory over the French (6th August 1870) is by the latter usually called Reichshofen.

Worth'ing (th soft), a fashionable Sussex watering-place, 10½ miles W. by S. of Brighton and 56 SSW. of London. It has risen from a small fishing-village since 1760, its growth being rapid after visits of the Princess Amelia (1797) and the Princess Charlotte (1807). The climate is much milder than that of Brighton, the place being encircled on the north and north-east by the Downs, which shelter it from cold winds, and render it one of the best winter-resorts on the south coast. There are wide sands, a long parade, public parks, a museum, and an iron pier (1862; destroyed 1913). Fruit and tomato growing is largely carried on, many acres being covered with glass. Worthing was constituted a municipal borough in 1890. Pop. (1851) 5370; (1881) 11,821; (1911) 30,305.

Wotton-under-Edge, a Gloucestershire town, 4 miles S. of Dursley. Pop of parish, 3000.

Wrangel Land (Vrang'el), an island in the Arctic Ocean, lying N. of the eastern extremity of Asia, and intersected by the meridian of 180° E. long. It was sighted by Sir Henry Kellett in 1849, re-discovered by the American De Long in 1867, who named it after Baron Ferdinand von Wrangel (Russian arctic explorer, 1821–23), and explored by the American expedition of 1881.

Wrath, Cape. See Cape Wrath.

Wratza (Vratz'a), a town of Bulgaria, 43 miles NE. of Sofia. Pop. 15,000.

Wrekin (Ree'kin). See Shropshire.

Wrexham (Rex'am), a town of Denbighshire, called sometimes the 'metropolis of North Wales,' on an affluent of the Dee, 12 miles SSW. of Chester. Its church, destroyed by fire in 1457, and rebuilt in 1472–1520, is a fine Perpendicular structure, whose tower, 135 feet high, contains ten bells of singular sweetness, and is one of the 'Seven Wonders of Wales.' Judge Jeffreys was born close by, at Acton; and Bishop Heber wrote 'From Greenland's Icy Mountains' in the vicarage. Wrexham is situated in the heart of a mining district, and has far-famed breweries, tanneries, &c. It was incorporated in 1857, and with Denbigh (q.v.), &c. returns one member. Pop. (1851) 6717; (1911) 18,377. See Palmer's History of Wrexham (4 vols. 1893).

Wrington, a Somerset parish, 10 miles SSW. of Bristol. The church has one of the finest towers in England. John Locke was born here.

Wrotham, a town of Kent, 6 miles ENE. of Sevenoaks. Pop. 4200.

Wroxeter (Rox'eter), a village of Shropshire (pop. 600), on the Severn, 6 miles SE. of Shrewsbury. It occupies part of the site of the Roman station of Uriconium, an important place on Watling Street, excavated since 1912.

Wu-chang. See Hankow.

Wu-chow, a Chinese treaty port on the Si-kiang, in Kwang-si, 180 miles W. of Canton.

Wudwan, or Wadhwán, a native state of Kathiawar, W. India. Area, 237 sq. m.; pop. 50,000, mostly Mohammedans. Wudwan town (pop. 27,000) is 110 miles NW. of Baroda by rail.

Wu-hu, a Chinese treaty port, near the Yangtsze, 50 miles above Nanking. Pop. 122,000.

Wupper (Voop'per), or Wipper, a right-hand tributary (40 miles long) of the Rhine, between Cologne and Düsseldorf. It has a strong current, and drives hundreds of mills, so that the Wupperthal, especially round Barmen (q.v.) and Elberfeld (q.v.), is one of the most populous and industrial in Germany. The interest of the inhabitants in missions is conspicuous.

Würtemberg (nearly Veer'temberg), a German kingdom, lying between Baden and Bavaria, and touching Switzerland (Lake of Constance) on the south. It entirely surrounds Hohenzollern, in which state, as well as in Baden, it owns several enclaves. Area, 7529 sq. m. (a little larger than Wales); pop. (1875) 1,881,505; (1910) 2,437,574. Chief town, Stuttgart (q.v.); Ulm, Heilbronn, Esslingen, Reutlingen, have from 56,000 to 30,000 inhabitants. The Black Forest (3776 feet) lies along its W. boundary; whilst the Swabian Alb (3327 feet) stretches right across the country, forming the watershed between the Neckar and the Danube, the principal rivers; the northern portions belong to the Bavarian plateau. Mineral springs are plentiful. The numerous fertile valleys produce wine and fruit in abundance. Forests occupy some 31 per cent. of the total area. Iron and salt are mined. The industries employ 41 per cent. of the population, the more notable branches being gold and silver work, hardware, iron-casting, machinery, watches, &c. Of the total population 69 per cent. are Protestants. The hereditary sovereign is assisted by two houses of parliament. The national income and expenditure balance at about £5,500,000 per annum; the national debt amounts to £30,500,000, nearly all incurred for building railways. Famous Würtembergers were Baur, Dannecker, Hauff, Hegel, Kepler, Kerner, Œcolampadius, Schelling, Schiller, D. F. Strauss, Uhland, Wieland, &c.

Würtemberg, then occupied by the Suevi, was conquered in the 1st c. A.D. by the Romans. In the 3d it was overrun by the Alemanni, who in their turn were subdued by the Franks. In or before the 13th c. it was created a countship, and in 1495 a duchy of the empire. Duke Frederick II. (1797–1816) on going over to the French was rewarded with 850 sq. m. of new territory and an addition of 125,000 subjects, as well as the dignity of Elector (1802). In Napoleon's war against Austria (1805) he sided with the French, and his troops fought with them down to 1813; in return for which he acquired the kingly title and an increase of territory that more than doubled the number of his subjects. Throwing in her lot with Austria in 1866, Würtemberg was beaten, and compelled to purchase peace from Prussia. Yet in 1870 the Würtembergers fought bravely in the German cause, and in 1871 the country became part of the German empire.

Würzburg (Veertz'boorg), capital of the Bavarian province of Lower Franconia, on the Main, 70 miles SE. of Frankfort by rail. Among the public buildings are the Episcopal Palace (1720–44), one of the most magnificent royal residences in Germany, the Julius Hospital (1576), the university buildings, the town-hall, &c. The fortress of Marienberg, on whose site Drusus founded a castle, crowns a hill 400 feet high, on the Main's left bank, and was till 1720 the episcopal residence. Besides the richly decorated cathedral, which was rebuilt in the 11th and following centuries, there are the exquisite Marienkapelle; the university church; and the Neumünster Church, containing the bones of Würzburg's patron, St Kilian, and of Walther von der Vogelweide. In front of the Julius Hospital there is a bronze statue of Bishop Julius; he also in 1582 founded the university, which has 100 professors, 1500 students—half of them medical—and a library of over 350,000 vols. There are manufactures of tobacco, furniture, machinery, surgical instruments, railway carriages, lamps, vinegar, wine, beer, and iron. Pop. (1880) 51,014; (1910) 84,496. Würzburg (Lat. Wirceburgum) was long the capital of a sovereign bishopric, conferred in 1803 mostly on the Elector of Bavaria.

Würzen (Veertz'en), a Saxon town, on the Mulde, 18 miles E. of Leipzig, with a 12th-century cathedral, an old castle, and manufactures of biscuits, carpets, felt, wire, cigars, &c. Pop. 18,000.

Wyborg. See VIBORG.

Wycombe (Wick'om), a town of Buckinghamshire, stands, surrounded by beech-clad hills, on the Wye, a small feeder of the Thames, 25 miles ESE. of Oxford and 29 (by rail 34½) WNW. of London. Called variously Chipping (or Chepping) Wycombe and High Wycombe, it was the seat of a Saxon fortress, Desborough Castle, some remains of which may be seen, and has a fine cruciform parish church (1273–1522; restored 1874–88) with a tower 96 feet high, a guildhall (1757–1859), a literary institute (1854), a free library, a hospital (1875), a grammar-school (1555; new buildings, 1883), and an auction-mart (1887). Lace is made, but the staple manufacture is that of beech-wood and other chairs—between one and two millions annually—with latterly whole furniture suites of a very high character. There are also some large paper-mills in the town and district. Hughenden and Chalfont, both noticed separately, are near. Wycombe, which returned two members till 1867, and then one till 1885, was governed by a mayor in Henry III.'s time, but first incorporated by Henry VI.; the municipal boundary was extended in 1880. Pop. (1881) 10,618; (1911) 20,387. See works by Thomas Langley (1797), H. Kingston (1848), and John Parker (1878).

Wye, a beautiful river of Wales and England, rises in two copious springs on the SE. side of Plinlimmon, not 2 miles from the head-water of the Severn (q.v.). It thence flows 150 miles in a generally south-east direction through or along the borders of the counties of Montgomery, Radnor, Brecknock, Hereford, Monmouth, and Gloucester, till it enters the Severn's estuary below Chepstow. At Chepstow the tide has been known to rise 47 feet above low-water mark. The chief affluents are the Lug and Ithon on the left, and the Monnow, Caerwen, and Irfron on the right. Salmon-fishing has greatly improved again. The Wye is not much of a boating river, though a pair-oar has been rowed down it from Boughrood, above Hereford. The part of it separating Monmouth from Gloucester is that chiefly visited for its singular beauty. See CHEPSTOW, TINTERN, ROSS, &c., and works by Gilpin (1782), Heath (1800), Ritchie (1841), Howitt (1863), and Bevan (1887).

Wyke Regis, a Dorset village, 2 miles WSW. of Weymouth.

Wylam, a Northumbrian village, 8¼ miles W. of Newcastle. George Stephenson was a native.

Wymondham (Wind'ham), a Norfolk market-town, 9½ miles WSW. of Norwich. It has a curious market-cross and the church of a priory (1130). Kett was a native. Pop. of parish, 4800.

Wy'naad, or VAYANÁD, a highland district in the Western Ghâts, about 3000 feet above sea-level. Its auriferous quartz began to be worked as a gold-field about 1865, and absorbed in 1876–86 millions of British capital.

Wynberg (Wine'berg), a town on the SE. slopes of Table Mountain, 8 miles SE. of Cape-town (of which it is a suburb) by rail, in a rich wine-growing country. Pop. 16,500.

Wynyard (Win'yard), the Grecian mansion of the Marquis of Londonderry, in Durham county, 5 miles NNW. of Stockton-upon-Tees.

Wyo'ming, a NW. state of the American Union, lies mainly on the E. slope of the Rocky Mountains, and is bounded by Montana, South Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, and Montana. The length, E. to W., is 360 miles, and the width is 275 miles; area, 97,890 sq. m. The state is traversed by the main axis of the Rocky Mountains, with Frémont's Peak (13,790 feet) and Mount Hayden (13,691). The Yellowstone (q.v.) National Park is mainly within its limits. Interspersed between the ranges are broad plateaus with arable soils, which with proper irrigation yield prolific crops; but less than one-sixth of the state is capable of cultivation; Wyoming is essentially a grazing country. The mean elevation of the plateau regions is from 7000 to 8000 feet. Yellowstone Lake has an altitude of 7778, Lewis Lake 7750, and Shoshone Lake 7670 feet above the sea. The state drains directly to the Pacific, to the Missouri, to the Columbia, and to the Colorado. In the mountain regions are deposits of gold and silver and ores of copper and iron. Coal is worked; and there are supplies of soda, some tin, abundance of limestone, and oil-wells. The climate is dry, although the country is well watered by streams. The summers are mild and delightful, but in exposed regions the winters are severe. The chief towns are Cheyenne, the capital, Laramie, Rock Springs, Rawlins, and Evanston. Wyoming comprises portions of the territories acquired by the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, and by the treaty with Mexico in 1848. It was organised as a territory in 1868, and admitted a state in 1890. Pop. (1870) 9118; (1900) 92,531; (1910) 152,056.

Wyoming Valley, a beautiful, fertile valley on the Susquehanna River, in north-eastern Pennsylvania, about 30 miles long by 5 wide. From 1754 on, its possession was disputed by Pennsylvanian and Connecticut settlers; Campbell's Gertrude of Wyoming recounts, not without mistakes, the bloody struggle on June 30–July 5, 1778, during the revolutionary war, against an invading force of 'Tories' and Seneca Indians. The valley is very rich in anthracite coal.

Wyre, a river of Lancashire, flowing 28 miles south-westward to the Irish Sea at Fleetwood.

Wyre Forest, in NW. Worcestershire, near Bewdley, is the S. part of the Severn coalfield.

XALAPA. See JALAPA.

Xanthi, a town of Bulgaria, Turkish till the war of 1912–13, 28 miles ENE. of Kavala, exports tobacco; pop. 13,000.

Xanthus (x as z), the capital of ancient Lycia, on the river Xanthus, 8 miles from its mouth.

Xenia (Zen'ia), a town of Ohio, on the Little Miami River, 65 m. NNE. of Cincinnati; pop. 8700.

Xeres, or (1) JEREZ DE LA FRONTERA (Hay'reth de la Frontay'ra), the centre of the sherry trade of Spain, 14 (by rail 30) miles NE. of Cadiz, with a Moorish castle (Alcazar), and many large bodegas or wine-stores. The Asta Regia of the Romans, it owes its modern name to the Moors, who near by in a seven days' battle defeated Roderic, the last of the Goths, in 711. Population, 63,000.—(2) XEREZ DE LOS CABALLEROS (Hayreth de lōs Cavalyay'rōs), 40 miles S. of Badajoz, is a picturesque old town, once a seat of the Templars (hence the name); pop. 10,000.

Xesibeland (Zes'ibey-land), between Griqualand East and Pondoland, was annexed to Cape Colony in 1886.

Y, THE. See AMSTERDAM, ZUIDER ZEE.

Yablon'ovoi, or YABLONOI, a ridge of mountains in NE. Asia, dividing the Amur basin from that of the Lena. Some peaks are 7000 feet high.

Yair, the ancient seat of the Pringles, on the Tweed, 5 miles NNW. of Selkirk.

Yakutsk (u as oo), a town of Eastern Siberia, on a branch of the Lena, 4 miles from the main stream; pop. 8000.—Area of Yakutsk government, 1,533,397 sq. m. (equal to four-fifths of European Russia); pop. 350,000.

Yalta, a Crimean seaport, 3 miles E. of Livadia (q.v.); pop. 15,000.

Yalu, the frontier-river between Corea and Manchuria, flowing 300 miles SW. to the Bay of Corea. The passage was forced by the Japanese, and the Russians driven back in May 1904; and in the estuary a Japanese fleet had defeated a Chinese one in 1894.

Yamagata, an important commercial town on the main island of Japan, 30 miles W. by S. of Sendai. Pop. 50,000.

Yanáon, a small patch of Indian soil belonging to France, and under the governer of Pondicherry, forming a small enclave surrounded by British territory (Madras), with 5 sq. m. of area and 5000 inhabitants. It lies near the mouth of the Godavari.

Yanbu', or YEMBO. See MEDINA.

Yandun, a town of Thongwa, Burma, in the delta of the Irawadi; pop. 20,000.

Yang-tsze-kiang (better simply Kiang or Chiang), the longest and most important of Chinese rivers, affording a waterway, not unbroken by rocks and rapids, across the breadth of China, rises in the mountains of Tibet, where its sources were explored by Prejevalsky in 1884–85, and after a course of 3200 miles (SE., NE., and E.), reaches the sea by a wide estuary which begins 50 miles below Nanking, and may be held to terminate near Shanghai. On its banks are also Chin-kiang, Ngan-king, Hankow, Wu-chang, Ichang, and Chung-king (opened to European commerce by treaty in 1890). Some of its many tributaries are over 1000 miles long; its basin is estimated at 689,000 sq. m. Its importance for commerce is enormous, though the navigation is in places difficult even for the native boats, which have to be shoved and poled through the narrow gorges against a strong current. Steamers run in the lower parts. See books by Little (1888) and D'Outremer (1911).

Yanina See JANINA.

Yank'ton, capital of a county in South Dakota, and prior to 1883 capital of the territory of Dakota, stands on the Missouri's N. bank, nearly 200 miles above Omaha, and 569 by rail W. by N. of Chicago. It contains mills and breweries, railway-shops and grain elevators. Pop. 4000.

Yare, a Norfolk river, flowing 50 miles E. pas Norwich, to the sea at Yarmouth.

Yarkand', the commercial capital of Eastern Turkestan, on the Yarkand or Zerafshan River, 100 miles SE. of Kashgar. It was visited by Marco Polo, but was hardly known till R. Shaw in 1871 published an account of his residence there three years before. Pop. 90,000.

Yarm, a market-town in the North Riding of Yorkshire, on the Tees, 4 miles SSW. of Stockton. Pop. 1600.

Yarmouth (Yar'muth), a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough, seaport, watering-place, and fishing-town of Norfolk, 20½ miles E. of Norwich and 122 NNE. of London. It stands 2½ miles from the mouth of the river Yare, on a slip of land 1½ mile broad, which is washed on the west by the Yare, expanding here into Breydon Water, and on the east by the German Ocean. A bridge connects the town with its Suffolk suburbs of Southtown, or Little Yarmouth, and Gorleston. The main streets of Yarmouth run parallel to the river, and are intersected by 145 narrow 'rows,' resembling the 'wynds' of Edinburgh. The sea frontage has a fine marine parade, with the Wellington and Britannia Piers (1854–58) and the Old Jetty (1808). St Nicholas' Church, founded by Bishop Herbert de Losinga, and restored between 1847 and 1884, is one of the largest parish churches in the kingdom, measuring 230 feet in length, 110 in breadth, and 148 across the transept, with a modern spire 168 feet high; a feature of its churchyard is the number of gravestones to drowned mariners. The Nelson Monument (1818) is a Doric column 144 feet high; and one may also notice the new municipal buildings, Queen Anne in style (1882), the covered fish-market (1867), the sailors' home (1860), the aquarium (1876), the royal military hospital (1809), militia barracks, spacious market-place, some remains of the old walls, &c. Yarmouth is the principal seat of the English herring-fishery; and its 'bloaters' are widely esteemed. Deep-sea fishing is also carried on, and there is considerable shipping, the present harbour-channel of the Yare having been formed in 1559–67, whilst in Yarmouth Roads, inside a line of sandbanks, there is safe anchorage. The exports include fish and agricultural produce; shipbuilding is carried on, and iron, ropes, sails, silk, &c. are manufactured. The town, too, owes much of its well-being to its attractions as a lively watering-place. None of its worthies is more famous than 'Peggotty;' in its history may be noticed its feuds with the Cinque Ports, the plague of 1338–39, which cost 7000 lives, and the fall of a suspension bridge (1845), when seventy-nine persons were drowned. Chartered by King John, it returned two members to parliament from Edward II.'s time till 1867, and regained one of them in 1885; in 1888 it was created a county borough. Pop. (1881) 46,767; (1911) 55,905. See works by C. J. Palmer (1856), J. G. Nall (1860–66). W. F. Crisp (1871), and others cited at NORFOLK.

Yarmouth, a small seaport in the north-west of the Isle of Wight, 10 miles W. of Newport. It was once an important fortified place, and till 1832 returned two members. Pop. 900.

Yaroslav. See JAROSLAV.

Yarrow, a Scottish stream famous in song and ballad, that rises at the meeting-point of Peebles, Dumfries, and Selkirk shires, and flows 25 miles north-eastward till it joins the Ettrick, 2 miles above Selkirk town. About 5 miles from its source it expands into first the Loch of the Lowes (1 by ¼ mile) and then St Mary's Loch (3 by ½ mile; 814 feet above sea-level), the two being separated only by a neck of land on which stands Tibbie Shiels's hostelry. Under SELKIRKSHIRE have been noticed a few of the many memories of that hill-girt lake and the deep swirling stream; and reference may be also made to Angus's Ettrick and Yarrow (1894) and Borland's Yarrow, its Poets and Poetry (1890), the poets including Hamilton of Bangour, Logan, Hogg, Scott, and Wordsworth.

Yass-Canberra. See CANBERRA.

Yassy. See JASSY.

Yazoo' City, a town of Mississippi, on the Yazoo River, 45 miles N. by W. of Jackson; pop. 6800.

Yeadon, a town of Yorkshire, England, on the Aire, 6 miles NW. of Leeds by rail, with woollen manufactures; pop. 7500.

Yedo. See TOKYO.

Yeisk (Yīsk), or EISK, a seaport of the Caucasian province of Kuban; pop. 50,000.

Yell, one of the Shetland Islands, 25 miles N. of Lerwick; area, 81½ sq. m.; greatest height, 672 feet; pop. 2300.

Yellala Falls (Yel-lah'la), the lowest of a series of falls or rapids which interrupt the navigation of the Congo (q.v.) near Vivi, 110 miles from the mouth of the river.

Yellow River. See HOANG-HO.

Yellow Sea, or WHANG-HAI, an important inlet of the Pacific Ocean, washes the Corea and the north part of the east coast of China; it terminates on the NW. in the Gulf of Pe-chi-li. It is becoming shallower from the quantity of alluvium borne down into it by the rivers Hoang-ho and Yang-tsze.

Yellowstone, the largest affluent of the Missouri, rises high up in the Rocky Mountains in Wyoming, flows 25 miles NW. to the mountain-girt Yellowstone Lake (22 miles long, 7788 feet above sea-level), thence N. through the National Park into Montana, partly through stupendous cañons, and then ENE. and NE. to the Missouri, on the western border of North Dakota. It is some 1300 miles long, and is navigable for steamboats 300 miles, to the mouth of the Big Horn, its largest affluent.

The Yellowstone National Park occupies the extreme north-western corner of Wyoming, and forms a square about 75 miles in diameter, almost all of it more than 6000 feet above sea-level, and rising in the snow-covered mountains to 10,000 and 14,000 feet. Situated on the 'Great Divide,' 'its pine-clad mountains form the gathering-ground for the head-waters of large rivers flowing away to the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.' The region is remarkable as well for its scenery as for its famous hot springs and geysers. The river has two falls about 15 miles below the lake, the lower one a magnificent cataract 330 feet in height; then it passes through the Grand Cañon (20 miles), and receives Tower Creek, which itself has leapt out of a deep and gloomy cañon known as Devil's Den over a beautiful fall of 156 feet. Near the river are many of the hot springs, those of White Mountain, near the northern boundary of the Park, extending for 1000 feet up the sloping side, and their snow-white calcareous deposits standing like a series of great frozen cascades. A few miles from Sulphur Mountain, with its vapours rising from fissures and craters, is the active Mud Volcano, with a crater 25 feet in diameter. All the hot springs of the Park number nearly 10,000. But the most singular feature of the region is its geysers, with columns of hot water 50 to 200 feet high, the most magnificent in the world. These are found principally on the Firehole River, a fork of the Madison, at the western end of Shoshone Lake, and in the Norris basin, to the north of that on the Firehole. The region was visited and described by surveyors in 1869, and explored and mapped in 1871. In 1872 Congress dedicated and set it apart 'as a public park or pleasuring ground for the benefit and enjoyment of the people;' and increased the area in 1891. Two troops of cavalry are quartered in the Park to preserve the forests and wild animals (bisons, elks, antelopes, &c.), and to act as police. A branch of the Northern Pacific Railway extends to its N. boundary. See works by Synge (1892), Wiley (1893), Chittenden (1895), Raftery (1909).

Yemen. See ARABIA.

Yenikale (Yen-i-kah'ley). See KERTCH.

Yenisei (Yen-i-zay'ee), one of the largest rivers of Siberia, formed by the junction of the Shishkit and Beikhem, which rise in the mountains on the southern border of Siberia. It flows north through the centre of Siberia into the Arctic Ocean, forming at its mouth a long estuary, and has a total course of 3200 miles. It is navigable 1850 miles to Minusinsk. Its chief tributaries are the Angara or Upper Tunguska from Lake Baikal and the Lower Tunguska. See Seebohm's Siberia in Asia: a Visit to the Valley of the Yenesay (1882).

Yeniseisk (Yen-i-zay'eesk), a town of Eastern Siberia, on the Yenisei River; pop. 13,000.—Area of Yeniseisk government, 987,186 sq. m.; pop. 1,000,000. Its capital is Krasnoyarsk.

Yeo, a river of Dorset and Somerset, flowing 24 miles to the Parret at Langport.

Yeovil (Yo'vil), a municipal borough of Somerset, 40 miles S. of Bristol and 123 WSW. of London, is a busy, handsome place, built of red brick and yellow stone, and situated on a hillside sloping to the Yeo. St John's Church, 'the Lantern of the West,' is a fine Perpendicular structure of the 15th c., restored in 1864, with a tower 90 feet high. A Grecian town-hall was built in 1849. The woollen industry belongs to the past; but the manufacture of kid and other gloves is largely carried on. Yeovil, which lost 117 houses by fire in 1449, is a borough by prescription, since 1853 under the Municipal Act. Pop. 14,000.

Yesso. See JAPAN.

Yet'holm, a Border village of Roxburghshire, at the foot of the Cheviots, 7½ miles SE. of Kelso. Bowmont Water divides it into Town-Yetholm and Kirk-Yetholm, the latter long the headquarters of the Scottish Gypsies, who seem to have settled here as early at least as the 17th century. Pop. 530. See works by Baird (1862), Lucas (1882), and Brockie (1884).

Yezd, or YAZD, a city near the centre of Persia, on a small oasis, and on the route between Ispahan and Kerman. Pop. 45,000—3000 Parsees.

Yez'o. See JAPAN.

Yilgarn. See WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Ynyscynhaiarn, the urban district in which is Portmadoc (q.v.).

Yokoha'ma (a as ah), the chief port of entry in Japan. Until the opening of the country in 1854 it was an insignificant fishing-village, contiguous to the important town of Kanagawa, originally granted as a treaty settlement. The Bluff, conceded for residence in 1867, is a beautiful spot commanding fine views of Fuji-san and of Yokohama Bay. The modern town is well laid out, and contains many fine stone buildings, public and private, churches, hospitals, recreation grounds, newspapers in English, French, and Japanese, &c. The bay is very beautiful, and the anchorage is protected by two breakwaters 12,000 feet in length. Ships are loaded at an iron pier 2000 feet long, and there are two large graving-docks. There is direct steamship communication with the principal ports of the world. Silk represents three-fifths of the exports, the rest being other tissues, tea, copper, &c.; the imports are cottons and woollens, raw sugar, oils, metals, chemicals, arms, watches, &c. Pop. 400,000.

Yokosuka, an important shipbuilding town and naval station of Japan, 13 miles S. by W. of Yokohama; pop. 70,000.

Yola, a town of Nigeria, on the Benuë, capital of a province.

Yonkers, a city of New York State, on the Hudson River, opposite the Palisades, and 15 miles by rail N. by E. of the centre of New York, of which it is a suburb; pop. 80,000.

Yonne (Yon), a dep. of NE. France; area, 2868 sq. m.; pop. (1886) 355,364; (1911) 303,889. Its arrondissements are Auxerre (the capital), Avallon, Joigny, Sens, Tonnerre.

York, the county town of Yorkshire, is situated at the confluence of the river Foss with the Ouse, 188 miles N. of London by rail. It is the seat of an archbishopric, the centre of the northern military district, and returns two members to parliament. The population of the municipal borough in 1881 was 61,789, and as a county borough in 1911, 82,282. The city, together with the surrounding district called the Ainsty, is under the jurisdiction of a lord mayor, twelve aldermen, and thirty-six councillors. York was known as Eborăcum under the Romans, of whom many relics still remain, chief among them being the building known as the Multangular Tower. The numerous sepulchral monuments, pavements, and other relics now preserved in the museum were mainly found in the extensive Roman cemetery discovered in digging the foundations of the railway station. From the time of Henry II. for five hundred years parliaments occasionally sat at York, as the name of Parliament Street still bears witness, while under Henry III. the courts of King's Bench and Exchequer were held here. The Minster is among the most magnificent of English cathedrals. Early in the 7th century Edwin, the first Christian king of Northumbria, founded here a church which perished by fire in 741. The church was rebuilt, but, during the conflagration of the city at the time of the Norman invasion, was again destroyed, with the exception of the central wall of the existing crypt, which also contains portions of the Norman church erected by Archbishop Rodger (1154–81). Early in the following century the beautiful Early English transepts were added by Archbishop Gray. The present nave was built between 1291 and 1345; the graceful Decorated chapter-house between 1300 and 1330; and the Norman choir was superseded by a Perpendicular one, 1373–1400. The central lantern tower belongs to the beginning of the 15th c., and the two western towers were added between 1430 and 1470. In 1829 the roof and carved choir-stalls perished in an incendiary fire, and in 1840 another fire destroyed the roof of the nave and the splendid peal of bells, reducing the south-western tower to a mere shell. Especially worthy of notice is the Decorated stained glass, the great east window being almost unrivalled. The extreme length of the Minster is 524 feet, of the transepts 250, and the breadth of the nave is 140 feet; the height of the central tower is 216, and of the western ones 201 feet.

The Benedictine Abbey of St Mary possessed great wealth and importance. It was founded in the reign of Rufus, but was largely rebuilt towards the end of the 13th c. The existing ruins are principally those of the beautiful abbey church, while the old Guest-house has now been appropriated as a storehouse for Roman and other antiquities. There is a fine R. C. pro-cathedral (1864). The present walls, 2¾ miles in circuit, are mainly of the time of Edward III., though in many parts they follow the line of the Roman earthwork. They are pierced by picturesque gates, locally called Bars, of which Bootham Bar and Micklegate Bar are especially well preserved. The castle, with its picturesque Clifford's Tower, is situated close to the river, and is believed to date from the time of Edward I., though older portions may be included in the structure, which suffered severely during the siege of 1644. The Assize Courts are now held here. The fine Gothic structure of the Guildhall belongs to the 15th c. There are several endowed schools: St Peter's School under the government of the Chapter, founded in 1557; Archbishop Holgate's Free School, dating from the time of Henry VIII.; the Blue-coat School for boys, the Grey-coat for girls, and the Yorkshire School for the Blind. Among other institutions may be enumerated the County Hospital, the Dispensary, the Lunatic Asylum, and the Free Library, opened by the Duke of York in 1893. York is an important railway centre, and its station (1873–77) is one of the largest in England. The British Association was organised at York in 1831, and its jubilee meeting was appropriately held there in 1881. Alcuin, Guy Fawkes, Flaxman, and Etty were natives. See Canon Raine's York ('Historic Towns' series, 1893).

York, the capital of York county, Pennsylvania, on Codorus Creek, 28 miles by rail SSE. of Harrisburg. It has a large granite court-house, a handsome collegiate institute, foundries, car-factories, railway-shops, planing-mills, and manufactories of shoes, condensed milk, &c. York dates from 1741, and was the seat of the Continental congress for a time in 1777. Pop. (1880) 13,940; (1900) 33,708; (1910) 44,756.

York, a river of Virginia, formed by the union of the Pamunkey and Mattapony, and flowing south-eastward to Chesapeake Bay, nearly opposite Cape Charles. It is 40 miles long, and from 1 to 3 miles wide.

York Peninsula (Cape), the northernmost part of Queensland (q.v.). For Yorke Peninsula, see South Australia.

Yorkshire, by far the largest of the English counties, is divided for administrative purposes into three Ridings (thridings, or 'thirds'), each of which has its own lord-lieutenant, magistracy, and constabulary. There are twenty-six wapentakes in the county; and sundry subdivisions go by the name of shires, as Hallamshire, Richmondshire, Allertonshire, Howdenshire, Cravenshire or Craven, Holderness, and Cleveland. The county contains seven cities, York, Bradford, Hull, Leeds, Ripon, Sheffield, and Wakefield, other 22 county or municipal boroughs, 144 urban district councils, and 1572 civil parishes. The total area is 3,882,851 statute acres, or nearly 6067 sq. m., all, with the exception of the catchment basins of the Esk and parts of those of the Tees and Ribble, being drained by the Ouse and its great tributaries, the Swale, Ure, Nidd, Wharfe, Aire, Don, and Derwent. Since 1885 the county divisions have returned twenty-six members, and the cities and boroughs the same number. Pop. (1801) 859,133; (1841) 1,592,059; (1881) 2,886,564; (1911) 3,979,964, of whom 515,031 were in the East Riding, 419,546 in the North, 3,045,377 in the West Riding. The city of York had 82,282. The Pennine chain rises to its highest point in Mickle Fell, 2581 feet, while Ingleborough and Whernside touch respectively 2361 and 2384 feet. On the eastern side of the chain are the famous 'Yorkshire dales,' Wensleydale, Wharfedale, Swaledale, &c., in many of which are picturesque waterfalls, or 'forces' as they are locally called—such as Caldron Snout and High Force in Teesdale, or Aysgarth Force and Hardraw Force on the Ure. The Yorkshire coal-measures, on which are situated the manufacturing towns of Leeds, Bradford, Sheffield, Rotherham, Huddersfield, and Halifax, are confined to the southern portion of the county, and are continuous with those of Derbyshire and Notts. In the North Riding the Cleveland moors rise to heights of 1400 feet. The prosperity of Middlesborough is due to the celebrated hematite iron ores of Cleveland. In the East Riding is the high tableland of the Wolds. Since the beginning of the 19th century the manufactures of Yorkshire have enormously developed. Leeds and Bradford are the centres of the woollen and worsted trades, while the cutlery of Sheffield is unrivalled. Of the numerous smelting and puddling furnaces, the chief are those at Rotherham and Middlesborough. The agricultural portions of the county are well served by railways, while the manufacturing districts are covered with a network of lines; the chief towns being also connected by a system of canals, extending from sea to sea, and piercing the Pennine chain, at the height of 656 feet above the sea, by a tunnel three miles in length. Beyond the mining and manufacturing districts the population is agricultural, one of the principal industries being horse-breeding, for which Yorkshire is famous. Among the inland health-resorts Harrogate and Ilkley rank first, while the coast southward from Redcar and Saltburn is fringed with small watering-places, besides the larger towns of Whitby, Scarborough, Filey, Bridlington, Withernsea, and Hornsea.

The sepulchral barrows on the Wolds, and the caves of Craven and Kirkdale have yielded results that form the basis of our knowledge of Yorkshire prehistoric times. At the Roman conquest (50–79 A.D.) the country was inhabited by the Celtic Brigantes, or 'hillmen,' whose capital was at Isurium or Aldborough. York (Eboracum) for 300 years was the chief city of Northern Britain. Several of the emperors visited York, and here in 211 died Severus, and in 306 Constantius Chlorus. And from York his son Constantine the Great, having been proclaimed by the soldiery, set forth to assume the purple. By 547 the heathen Angles had established their rule, although the little British kingdoms of Leeds (Loidis) and Elmet held out till 616, when they were conquered by King Edwin of Northumbria, the Yorkshire portion of whose realm was known as Deira. Edwin, who had been baptised by Paulinus on Easter Day, 627, was defeated and slain at Hatfield Chase near Doncaster in 633, by Penda, the heathen king of Mercia. Toward the end of the 8th century the Northmen began to appear in the Humber, ravaging and finally settling in the country. Yorkshire contains the battlefields of Stamford Bridge, the Standard (Northallerton), Myton, Bramham Moor, Wakefield, Towton, and Marston Moor; and in 1536 it was the scene of the Pilgrimage of Grace, as in 1569 of another rising on behalf of Mary, Queen of Scots. During the Civil War the county was mainly royalist. No part of England is richer in the remains of monastic houses, eighty-one in all—Rievaulx, Jervaulx, Fountains, Kirkstall, and Bylands (Cistercian), Whitby, Selby, and St Mary's, York (Benedictine), Newburgh, Nostel, Bridlington, Guisborough, Bolton, and Kirkham (Augustinian), &c. Among the castles may be named those of Knaresborough, Pontefract, Conisborough, Richmond, Middleham, and Bolton.

Yorktown, capital of York county, Virginia, on the York River, 10 miles from its mouth. Pop. 150. Here Lord Cornwallis surrendered to Washington in 1781.

Yor'uba, or YARRIBA, once a West African kingdom, east of Dahomey, now mostly included in the British colony of (southern) Nigeria. Its pop., some 2,000,000, are Soudanese Negroes, partly Mohammedanised.

Yosemite Valley (Yo-sem'i-tey) is a cleft in the west slope of the Sierra Nevada, about the middle of California, and 140 miles E. of San Francisco. The name Yosemite is an Indian word which signifies 'large grizzly bear.' This celebrated valley, shut in by sheer granite walls 3000 to 6000 feet high, noted for the sublimity and beauty of its scenery, is 6 miles long and from ½ to nearly 2 miles broad. It is traversed by the Merced River, and its waterfalls are in some respects the most remarkable in the world. In the grand Yosemite Falls the stream, 25 feet wide at the crest, takes a first leap of 1500 feet, then rushes 626 feet down in a series of cascades, and finally plunges 400 feet to the bottom. Above the falls are the North Dome (3568) and the vast Half Dome (4737). The valley was discovered in 1851 by soldiers who pursued some predatory Indians to their fastness here; its fame quickly spread, and Congress wisely took steps to preserve its beauties, and in 1864 handed it over to the state, along with the Mariposa grove of sequoias. There are several hotels, a post-office, and a chapel in the valley, besides the houses of the guardian and the guides and others under him. See a work by Wiley (1893).

Youghal (pron. nearly Yawl), a seaport of County Cork, on the Blackwater estuary, 27 miles E. of Cork by rail. It has the parish church (1464), a handsome R. C. church, the 'water-gate' and 'clock-gate,' and Sir Walter Raleigh's house, Myrtle Grove, which remains nearly in its original state. Parts of the old walls are standing. According to local tradition, the potato was first planted at Youghal by Raleigh, who was mayor in 1588. The town returned one member till 1885. Pop. (1851) 7410; (1901) 5393; (1911) 5648.

Youngstown, a manufacturing town of Ohio, on the Mahoning River, 67 miles by rail SE. of Cleveland, and 66 NW. of Pittsburgh, with blast-furnaces, rolling-mills, manufactories of machinery, &c. Iron, coal, and limestone abound near by. Pop. (1880) 15,435; (1890) 33,220; (1910) 79,066.

Ypres (Eepr; Flemish Y'peren), a Belgian town, 30 miles SSW. of Bruges by rail, and 8 from the French frontier. It once was one of the most important manufacturing towns in Flanders, with 200,000 inhabitants in the 14th c., and 4000 looms. The only remnant of its once flourishing manufacture is the Gothic Cloth-hall (Les Halles), with a stately square belfry. It was built 1230-1342, and restored in 1860; a part was added in 1730. One of the wings is now used as the hôtel-de-ville. The cathedral of St Martin is a fine Gothic edifice (1221-1350). The chief modern manufactures are thread and lace. Pop. 17,000. Ypres is a very old town, dating from the 9th and 10th centuries. In 1688 it was strongly fortified by Louis XIV. Jansen was bishop of Ypres.

Ypsilanti (y as i), a city of Michigan, on the Huron River, 30 miles by rail W. by S. of Detroit. It contains the state normal school. Pop. 6000.

Ystad (Ee'stad), a seaport in the extreme south of Sweden, 30 miles SE. of Malmö by rail, with manufactures of sugar, matches, &c. Pop. 12,000.

Ystradyfodwg (Istradifo'doog). See RHONDDA.

Yucatan', a Central American peninsula, dividing the Gulf of Mexico from the Caribbean Sea, and bordering on British Honduras and Guatemala. It is a flat expanse, ridged only towards the east by a low chain of hills. It has obtained of late an unhappy notoriety for the cruelties—including practical slavery—exercised on the peons employed in the cultivation of henequen, or sisal-hemp. The interior is overspread with forests of mahogany, rosewood, and other valuable timber; while the south and east teem with maize, pulse, rice, tobacco, &c. Ruins of Uxmal, Chichen, Izamal, Mayapan, and other temples and vast edifices, richly carved and coloured, and of unknown history, testify to an ancient civilisation. Made known to Europe in 1517, and completely conquered in 1541, this part of New Spain (granted in 1783 to English logwood-cutters for a time) continued under Spanish domination till 1821. After repeated short periods of independence, it has since 1852 belonged to Mexico—from 1858 as two states, Campeachy (pop. 87,000) and Yucatan (pop. 340,000), and (1902) the territory of Quintana Roo (9000).

Yu'kon, the great river of Alaska, is formed by the junction of the Lewis and Pelly at Fort Selkirk, in British territory (62° 45′ N. lat.), and flows 2000 miles W. across Alaska into Behring Sea. Its upper reaches are navigable for steamers, but its vast delta is so silted up that it is not open to sea-going vessels. During three months of the year its waters swarm with salmon. Since 1895 the river gives name to a territory of Canada to the north of British Columbia. There are gold-mines at Klondike, for which Dawson is the central town. See a book by Tollemache (1912).

Yunnan (Yoon-nan), a province of SW. China, bounded on the S. by Annam, Siam, and Burma, with an area estimated at 122,000 sq. m., and a pop. estimated at 11,500,000, having sunk from 15,000,000 through plague and the war of the Mohammedan Panthays (1855-72). The surface is mainly an extensive uneven highland plateau, between whose ranges, which vary in height from 12,000 to 17,000 feet in the north to 7000 or 8000 in the south, are deep defiles through which run the Mekong, Salween, 'Shwéli, and other rivers of Indo-China. Fertile plains and valleys are numerous. In the northern part the surface is wild, broken, and barren, wrapped in mist and fog, and the population sparse. But the south and south-west are populous and richly cultivated. The first important exploration was by the French in 1867–68. Yunnan, the capital, stands on a great plain in the eastern half of the province, over 6400 feet above sea-level, near Lake Tien-chih. It has a flourishing trade and a pop. of 100,000. See a book (French) by Legendre (1913).

Yuruari. See VENEZUELA.

Yverdon (Eeverdon^{g}; also spelt Yverdun), a pleasant Swiss town in the Canton de Vaud, at the S. end of the Lake of Neuchâtel, 20 miles N. of Lausanne by rail. The old castle, built in 1135, was used by Pestalozzi as an educational institute; and is now occupied by municipal schools, a library, and museum. There is a sulphur-bath near the town. Pop. 9000.

Yvetot (Eev'toh), an old town of France, in the dep. of Seine-Inférieure, 24 miles NW. of Rouen by rail, with manufactures of linen, cotton, calico. Pop. 7000. The town and territory of Yvetot was long a semi-sovereign principality, and the Lord of Yvetot was till 1681 popularly styled 'Roi d'Yvetot.' Béranger's song of that title was a satire on Napoleon.

ZAANDAM (Zahn'dam), a Dutch town, on the Zaan, at its entrance to the Y, 5 miles NW. of Amsterdam by rail. It has many corn, oil, and saw mills, and active manufactures of paper, dyes, starch, tobacco, and glue, and still a little shipbuilding. Most of the sixty wharves it had in the 17th century have disappeared, and its famous whale-fishery is also a thing of the past. Here in 1697 Peter the Great worked in a shipbuilding yard as a carpenter; the hut in which he lived was visited in 1814 by the Czar Alexander. Pop. 25,000.

Zabern (Tzah'bern; Fr. Saverne), a town of Lower Alsace, 22 miles NW. of Strasburg by rail. Pop. 8600.

Zacatecas (Za-ka-tay'kas), capital of a Mexican state (area, 24,757 sq. m.; pop. 462,190), is situated in a deep ravine, 440 miles by rail NW. of Mexico city. It has a cathedral, and 3 miles E. the Franciscan college where the fathers of the old Californian missions were trained. Zacatecas is the great silver-producing state of Mexico, and around the city 15,000 men are employed in the mines, which since 1540 have yielded over $1,000,000,000. Gold has also been discovered. Population, 26,000.

Zadonsk', a Russian town on the Don, 70 miles N. of Voronej, is the seat of a celebrated monastery. Pop. 8800.

Zafarâni Islands (â as âh), three islets off the north coast of Morocco, occupied by Spain. Pop. 1000.

Zagazig (Zagazeeg'), a town of the Egyptian delta, an important railway centre, 50 miles NE. of Cairo, on a branch of the Sweet-water Canal connecting Ismailia with the Nile. Pop. 35,000.

Zähringen (Tzay'ring-en), a small village a mile N. of Freiburg in Breisgau, historically noteworthy for the ruined castle of the Dukes of Zähringen, the ancestors of the reigning House of Baden.

Zaire. See CONGO.

Za'ma, a city and fortress in Numidia, about 100 miles SW. of Carthage, near which Hannibal was defeated by the Younger Scipio, 201 B.C.

Zambe'si, Vasco da Gama's 'River of Good Signs,' ranking with the Congo and the Nile as a means of communication with the interior of Africa, is between 1550 and 1600 miles long, and drains more than half a million miles of territory. Soon after its rise in the marshy country to the west of Bangweolo it passes through Lake Dilolo at the SW. corner of Belgian Congo; and on its way to the Indian Ocean it receives many tributaries, notably the Loamba, Kafue, Loangwa, and Shiré. For about two-thirds of its length it flows through British protected territory, entering the Portuguese possessions near Zumbo (550 miles from the sea). The river is navigable, with occasional interruptions, to the Victoria Falls, 900 miles from the sea. At these falls, discovered in 1855 by Dr Livingstone, the river, here 1000 yards broad, drops sheer into a huge fissure in the earth's surface nearly 400 feet deep. The great girder bridge to carry the Cape-to-Cairo railway across the Zambesi (400 yards below the falls) was finished in 1905. Beyond this for 700 miles the river forms a frequently interrupted waterway to the interior. The delta of the Zambesi comprises an area of 2500 sq. m., and it has a number of mouths all more or less blocked with sand (Chinde, Kongoni, &c.).

Zambesia, a name for that portion of the territory watered by the river Zambesi which is now under British protection, sometimes loosely used for most of the country under the British South African Company (chartered in 1889). South Zambesia (southwards of the river) embraces Mashonaland (q.v.), Matabeleland (q.v.), a part of Manicaland, and Khama's Country in the Bechuanaland protectorate. North Zambesia extends to Lakes Tanganyika and Nyasa (q.v.). The railway system connects Salisbury and Bulawayo with Beira, with Capetown, and with the Belgian Congo. Zambesia, except the Nyasaland Protectorate and the Bechuanaland portion, is now part of Rhodesia (q.v.).

Zambesia, one of the administrative districts of Portuguese East Africa, in the lower valley of the Zambesi River.

Zamora (Span. pron. Tha-mo'ra), a very ancient town of Spain, on the Douro, 150 miles NW. of Madrid by rail. It has a late Romanesque cathedral, and some linen and woollen manufactures. Pop. 16,500.—Area of province, 4135 sq. m.; pop. 275,000.

Zamosc', a fortified town of Russian Poland, 154 miles SE. of Warsaw. Pop. 16,500.

Zanesville, a town of Ohio, on the Muskingum River, 67 miles by rail E. of Columbus. The river is crossed by an iron railway bridge 538 feet long (and by others) to its suburbs, Putnam and West Zanesville. It has rich coal-mines close by, and manufactures engines, boilers, flour, iron, cottons and woollens, glass, paper, tiles, &c. Pop. (1880) 18,113; (1910) 28,026.

Zanguebar'. See ZANZIBAR.

Zan'te (anc. Zacynthos), one of the Ionian Islands, 9 miles from the NW. coast of the Morea, and S. S. of Cephalonia, is 24 miles long and 12 broad; pop. 45,500. In the west it attains a maximum altitude of 2486 feet; the centre is fertile, and mainly devoted to growing the currant vine. Earthquakes are not infrequent, one of the worst in the beginning of 1893.—ZANTE, the capital, the largest town in the Ionian Islands, is at the head of a small bay on the east coast; pop. 13,600.

Zanzibar', since 1890 a British protectorate, consisting of the islands of Zanzibar (625 sq. m.; pop. 120,000) and Pemba (360 sq. m.; pop. 80,000). Some 200 Englishmen, a few other Europeans, and many British Indians live in the town of Zanzibar, on the west coast of the island (pop. 30,000), the chief trading town on the E. coast of Africa. Its imports and exports each average over £1,000,000 a year. Zanzibar ('Land of the Zenj,' a Swahili dynasty) formerly exercised authority over a large part of the mainland, with indefinite extensions inland, which was called Zanguebar as distinguished from the island. It was under Arab influence in the 10th c., Portuguese in the 15th–17th c. In 1856 a son of the imam of Muscat became sultan. Since 1870–90 the territories on the mainland have been absorbed by Britain (see IBEA) and Germany (see AFRICA), and the sultan is practically a British pensioner, all authority resting ultimately with the British agent and consul-general. See the travels of Stanley, J. Thomson, &c.; Zanzibar by Burton (1872); and works on the partition of Africa by Silva White (1890) and Keltie (1893).

Zara (Zah-ra; Slav. Zadar), capital of Dalmatia, on a promontory into the Adriatic, 130 miles SE. of Trieste, with a well-protected harbour. Its archiepiscopal cathedral (1205) was founded by Henry Dandolo, Doge of Venice. A marble column is all that is left of an ancient Roman temple; there are also the remains of a Roman aqueduct. The chief manufactures are the making of glass and of maraschino and rosoglio. Pop. 36,500, mainly Italians.

Zarafshan. See BOKHARA.

Zaragoza (Tharago'tha). See SARAGOSSA.

Zarskoe. See TSARSKOYE SELO.

Zaru'ma, a town of Ecuador, on the west slope of the Andes, 95 miles S. of Guayaquil. It has gold and quicksilver mines. Pop. 6000.

Zea. See CEOS.

Zea'land (Dutch Zeeland), a province of the Netherlands, consists of portions of Flanders (East and West) and of the islands Walcheren, North Beveland, South Beveland, Schouwen, Duiveland, and Tholen, with an area of 690 sq. m. and a pop. of 235,000.

Zea'land (Dan. Själland), a level island, the largest and most important of Denmark, lies between the Cattegat and the Baltic, and is separated by the Sound from Sweden and by the Great Belt from Fünen. Length, 81 miles; breadth, 67 miles; area, 2670 sq. m.; pop. (including the small islands of Möen, Samsö, &c.) 980,000. In it are Copenhagen, Elsinore, and Korsor.

Zebu, one of the Philippine Islands (q.v.).

Zeebrugge, the port of Bruges (q.v.), with which it is connected by a ship-canal opened 23d July 1907.

Zee'han (Dutch Zeehaan, 'sea-hen'), a mining township on the west coast of Tasmania, 29 miles by rail from the port of Strahan or Macquarie Harbour. The name is taken from a prominent mountain, 3 miles south-west, which Tasman, in 1642, named after one of his two ships. The township (population, 4000) owes its existence to the discovery in 1884 of rich silver-lead ores in great abundance.

Zeeland. See ZEALAND.

Zeila, or ZEYLA. See SOMALI-LAND.

Zeitun (Zī-toon'), a town 25 miles NW. of Marash in the highlands of the Aleppo province, with iron-mines. Pop. 20,000, mainly Armenian Christians.

Zeist. See ZEYST.

Zeitz (Tzītz), a walled town of Prussian Saxony, on the right bank of the White Elster, 23 miles SW. of Leipzig by rail. It manufactures woollens, cottons, calicoes, sugar, wax-cloth, pianofortes, cycles, &c. Pop. 33,000.

Zelle (Tzel'leh), or CELL, a manufacturing town of Prussia, on the navigable Aller, 28 miles by rail NE. of Hanover. From the 14th c. till 1705 it was the residence of the Dukes of Brunswick-Lüneburg; and in the old castle (1485) George III.'s unfortunate sister, Caroline Matilda of Denmark, lived from 1772 to 1775, and here she is buried. Pop. 24,000.

Zengg (Zeng), an Austrian port on the Croatian coast, 75 miles SE. of Trieste, with an old cathedral. Pop. 3000.

Zenjan', a town of Persia, half-way between Tabriz and Teheran. Pop. 25,000.

Zen'ta, a town of Hungary, on the Theiss, 33 miles S. of Szegedin by rail. Pop. 30,000.

Zug (Tzoogh), the smallest of the Swiss cantons, with an area of 92 sq. m. and a population of 30,000—German-speaking and Catholic.—Zug, the picturesque mediæval capital, lies at the NE. end of the Lake of Zug (8¾×2½ miles; 1368 feet above the sea; 1320 deep), 24¼ miles S. of Zurich by rail. Eleven persons were killed here in July 1887 by the fall of thirty houses into the lake. Pop. 8000.

Zuider Zee (Zoi'der Zay; 'Southern Sea,' as opposed to the North Sea), a large gulf penetrating 60 miles into the Netherlands, and 210 miles in circumference. The islands Texel, Vlieland, Terschelling, Ameland, and Schiermonnikoog, reaching in a chain across its entrance, are the remains of the former coast-line, which in 1282 was broken by the sea, the waters overflowing the low lands between Friesland and North Holland, uniting with the small inland lake Flevo, and forming the present Zuider Zee. In it lie the islands Wieringen, Urk, Schokland, and Marken. From the south-west of the Zuider Zee a long narrow arm, called the Y (pronounced I), formerly ran nearly due west, through the peninsula of Holland. A strong sea-dyke and locks have been constructed to cut off the Zuider Zee from the Y, through which a broad ship-canal has been made between Amsterdam and the North Sea. On both sides of the new canal the Y has been drained and turned into about 12,000 acres of rich land. The new waterway was formally opened by the king in 1876. In 1892–94 a royal commission recommended a scheme to drain the inner Zuider Zee and reclaim some 450,000 acres at a cost of £7,500,000; but the scheme failed to find parliamentary sanction.

Zululand, the NE. portion of Natal, extending from the Tugela River to Portuguese South Africa; area, 10,450 sq. m. It is well suited for agriculture and cattle-raising; gold is worked; and silver, lead, copper, tin, asbestos, and coal are found. It is but a small part of the country (now largely absorbed in the Transvaal) ruled over by the warlike Zulus, a Kaffir tribe. War was declared between Britain and their chief Cetewayo in 1878, the chief features of which were the British disaster of Isandula (22d January 1879), the heroic defence of Rorke's Drift, and the British victory of Ulundi (4th July 1880). After difficulties with the Boers, what remained of Zululand was declared a British protectorate in 1887, and in 1898 it was made an integral part of Natal. See books by Miss Colenso (1885), Peace (1884–93), Russell (1900), Gibson (1904), Barnett and Sweeney (1904), Theal (1908), Tatlow (1912).

Zurich (Zoo'rik; Ger. Zürich, pron. nearly Tsee'rihh), a northern Swiss canton, drained by the Rhine, and traversed from NW. to SE. by lofty hills, between which lie the three valleys of the Toss, Glatt, and Limmat. The last drains the beautiful Lake of Zurich, which, lying 1341 feet above sea-level, is 25 miles long and 2½ miles broad at the widest. Area, 666 sq. m.; pop., German-speaking and Protestant, (1870) 284,786; (1900) 430,336; (1910) 500,679.

Zurich, the capital, 41 miles by rail NNE. of Lucerne and 43 NW. of Glarus, is situated at the point where the Limmat issues from the Lake of Zurich. It is one of the most prosperous manufacturing and commercial towns of Switzerland, yet with narrow streets and lofty houses in its older quarters. Of the Romanesque cathedral, erected in the 11th and 13th centuries, Zwingli was pastor, as Lavater was of the Peterskirche. The university, founded in 1832, has nearly 150 teachers and more than 1700 students; the famous Polytechnic has 1500 students, and has served as model for many such institutions; and one may also notice the town-hall (1699), the botanic gardens, the six bridges, and the town library with over 100,000 volumes and 3000 MSS. Fuseli was a native. Pop. (1870) 56,695; (1910) 189,088.

Zut'phen, a town in the Dutch province of Guelderland, on the Yssel, here joined by the Berkel, 18 miles NNE. of Arnhem by rail. Of buildings the chief are the Great Church (1103; restored 1857) and the 'Wijn Huis' tower. At Rysselt, 3 miles N., is a boys' reformatory (1851). Zutphen has manufactures of paper, oil, leather, &c. It has been several times besieged; and in a skirmish on the field of Warnsfeld, to the E., Sir Philip Sidney received his death-wound, 2d October 1586. Pop. 20,000.

DIFFERENCES OF TIME

BETWEEN LONDON (GREENWICH) AND VARIOUS IMPORTANT PLACES ON THE GLOBE.

When it is twelve o'clock noon, in Greenwich mean time, the hour (local time) is as follows at:

	Hours.	Min.
Amsterdam	12	20	P.M.
Auckland, New Zealand	11	39	P.M.
Berlin	1	53	P.M.
Bombay	4	51	P.M.
Calcutta	5	53	P.M.
Capetown	1	14	P.M.
Constantinople	1	56	P.M.
Dublin	11	35	A.M.
Lisbon	11	24	A.M.
Melbourne	9	40	P.M.
Paris	12	9	P.M.
Peking	7	46	P.M.
Quebec	7	15	A.M.
Rome	12	50	P M.
St Petersburg	2	1	P.M.
San Francisco	4	23	A.M.
Sydney	10	5	P.M.
Trieste	12	55	P.M.
Vienna	1	6	P.M.

The difference is at the rate of 4 minutes for one degree of longitude, or one hour for 15°. Time is earlier or later than Greenwich according as the locality is east or west of Greenwich. Places lying close together, but on different sides of the longitude line of 180°, differ nominally by a whole day in time.

Following the example of the United States, all countries are gradually adopting Standard Time. By this is meant time which differs from Greenwich mean time by whole hours. The globe is divided into zones of 15° or one hour breadth, the Greenwich meridian being in the centre of the zero zone. Thus Belgium, Spain, Portugal, and France keep Greenwich time; Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, Austria, and Germany keep the time of Mid-Europe, or of longitude 15° E.—i.e. one hour earlier than Greenwich. In North America, again, five zones are distinguished. Halifax falls within the time zone of 60° W. long. or four hours later than Greenwich; Montreal and New York fall within the zone of 75° or five hours west of Greenwich; and so on across the entire continent. New York, Chicago, Denver, and San Francisco may be mentioned as places whose times change by one hour as we pass from one to the next succeeding. The corresponding times are distinguished as Eastern (67½—82½°), Central (82½—97½°), Mountain (97½—112½°), and Pacific (112½—127½°) times. Standard time in Japan is nine hours earlier than Greenwich time.
